The SPEAKER. On this roll call 225 Members, a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDING THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill referred to.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, can the Chair entertain a request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to do so, but does not think he has the right to after the House has voted to go into Committee of the Whole.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of S. 2472, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I should like to find out something about the control of the time. My understanding Saturday was that the ranking Democratic member of the committee should have yielded to him a certain amount of time to be controlled by him. My understanding was that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] was to yield 30 minutes to this side, to be controlled by the ranking Democratic member of the committee, but I do not know what the understanding was with reference to the yielding of time by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT]. I should like to have some understanding about that, so that we can allot the time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Arkansas that for the purpose of expediting the business of the House the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] for one hour and a half and will also recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] for one hour and a half, with the understanding that each gentleman is to yield half an hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN], who will control one hour.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, the gentleman from Massachusetts will control one hour, of which one-half hour is to be from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] and one-half hour from the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT]?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. In the absence of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN], I should like to have an understanding that I am to control that hour, so that I may know how to meet the requests that I have. I do not care for any time myself, but I should like to have it understood that I can yield that hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from New York will be willing to do that.

Mr. WINGO. If it is understood that I shall have one hour to control, one half from the gentleman from New York and the other half from the gentleman from Illinois, then I can arrange to meet the requests that I have.

Mr. PLATT. I am agreeable to that proposition, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WINGO. All right.

Mr. PLATT. I will yield to the gentleman from Arkansas 30 minutes—not immediately.

Mr. WINGO. I understand that. Here is the idea: Let me control one hour, one half of which is to come from the gentleman from New York and the other half from the gentleman from Illinois. In other words, each one of us three will control one hour of the general debate.

Mr. PLATT. I think that is fair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to recognize that arrangement.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is not my purpose to speak on this bill, important though it is; but I do want to bring to the attention of the House another matter that seems to me of first importance. I have in my hand a telegram——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Under the rule under which this measure is being considered it was provided that all debate should be limited to the subject in the bill, and I must object to any extraneous debate under that rule, and I raise the point of order that the gentleman admits that he does not intend to talk on the bill.

Mr. REAVIS. My understanding of the rule is that debate is not necessarily confined to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. If the Chair will inspect the record of the adoption of the rule, he will find that all debate was to be limited to the subject matter of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule contains no such provision.

Mr. BLANTON. But the agreement was in connection with the adoption of the rule. If the Chair will inspect the record, I am sure he will find it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I insist that when we adopt an agreement it should be kept.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a telegram——

Mr. BLANTON. I insist on my point of order.

Mr. REAVIS. This is not to be taken from my time?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does not the rule contain the agreement adopted by the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas claims that by unanimous consent it was also agreed in the House that debate should be limited to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I will not delay the gentleman while I find it. I will be able to cite it to the Chair later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, again let me state that I have in my hand a telegram from the editor of one of the most influential small daily newspapers of my State, which is quite characteristic of several similar communications recently received by me, and which I would like to read. The telegram follows:

NEBRASKA CITY, NEBR., October 31.

Hon. C. F. REAVIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Small newspapers face possibility of suspension due to inability to get news-print paper. Large papers continue to waste paper with extra editions, which are unnecessary. Is it not possible to get immediate action through some governmental authority to ration print paper and prevent catastrophe coming to publishers of country papers, which are bulwark of this country? Our own supply to-day is barely sufficient for three days, and mills refuse to furnish print paper bought in good faith months ago.

J. H. SWEET.

After receiving this, and with the desire to be of assistance in the premises, I tried to locate some department or bureau which has authority to act. My experience was the one so common to all of us, of being passed and shunted from pillar to post, only to give it up as hopeless in the end.

The demand for print paper has increased 34 per cent this year over that of any previous year, an increase so great as to challenge inquiry on the part of those interested. The reason for the increase has been universally ascribed to the tremendous increase of what is called "national advertising."

I have information of the most reliable character as to this national advertising business and the causes which have so tremendously nurtured it. We have an excess-profits tax, one of the most profitable sources of revenue in the revenue laws. It is a graduated tax that increases proportionately as the excess profit increases. An institution showing profit of a certain sum must pay, let us say, a tax of 10 per cent; if the profit is over the specified sum, the tax is 12 per cent; and so on up as the profits increase in amount. If the profits are but slightly above the 12 per cent sum, a little judicious expenditure will bring it below that sum and save the institution thousands of dollars. From such motive and inspired by such purpose comes a large amount of the vastly increased national advertising. Not a Member who listens to me but has noted the unprecedented amount of advertising the magazines and great metropolitan dailies of the East are now carrying. Nothing like it has ever been known before. I have information of unquestioned reliability, coming from a source of assured truthfulness and opportunity for knowledge, that millions of dollars are now being expended in national advertising for the purpose of reducing the excess-profits tax which would otherwise go into the Treasury.

What is the result? Just this: The Government is losing money to which it is entitled, and the print-paper supply is being used to such an extent that the country press is facing destruction.

The department should at once investigate this matter. Nothing is in the way of compelling these enterprising gentlemen who are escaping taxation from disgorging.

I have no quarrel with a newspaper's prosperity; rather do I rejoice in it. I am in accord with the general view as to the usefulness of advertising, but I do object to the method adopted and the purpose sought to be served.

More than this, I object to the hardship inflicted on the country press. It is the bulwark of the country and one of the great stabilizing influences of the Nation. It has no ties or alliances that ever betray it away from the general good, and never does it become the representative of special interest. It reaches homes that are strangers to the great dailies, and it exercises at all times an influence as salutary as it is widespread.

Congress can not meet this question in time to be of service, but I feel impelled to call the situation to the attention of the Ways and Means Committee with the hope that some of its members will take this up with the Internal Revenue Department and have them look into the amount of advertising these gentlemen are claiming in their tax returns——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding if he wants to, but I do object to the extension of any further remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent to complete the sentence which was left suspended in the air when the gavel stopped me.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I think the RECORD should be uniform and all Members used alike. I re-instantly must object to the gentleman's completing the sentence.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas whether or not the morning's RECORD does not contain an extension of his own remarks?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; because the House authorized it.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, on account of having considerable material which I would like to present for the consideration of the House concerning this bill, I am going to ask the indulgence of the House that I be not interrupted during the presentation of it. I also ask at this time unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, reluctantly I must object, because I think the privilege of the RECORD should be uniform to all Members of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects, and the gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill without a name. It has a number, to wit, Senate 2472. But while it has no name and bears an indifferent number, it has a purpose—a tremendous purpose. Its importance entitles it to a consideration equal to that given the league of nations, for it proposes not merely to cement the nations of the earth by political bonds but to shackle them with the fetters of trade and to grapple them together with the hooks of greed.

The vital part of the bill is found in the very beginning, wherein, without further resort to the Congress, it furnishes authorization enabling any number of natural persons, not less than five, to form themselves into corporations for the purpose of—

First. Engaging principally in international or foreign banking;

Second. Engaging in other international or foreign financial operations;

Third. Engaging in banking or other financial operations in a dependency or insular possession of the United States;

Fourth. Engaging in any of the foregoing enterprises directly or through the agency, ownership, or control of local institutions in foreign countries, or in such dependency or insular possessions;

Fifth. To act, when required, as fiscal agents of the United States; and Sixth. To engage in other ventures not inconsistent with law.

These vital parts are left undisturbed by the rest of the bill, which consists of straggling and grotesque appendages in legislative courtesy called safeguards, which furnish no protection to the general public, but rather act as lubricants for the better working of these contemplated money-getting contrivances.

The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hand is the hairy hand of Esau.

BUREAUCRATIC LEGISLATION.

This bill presents a fine specimen of bureaucratic legislation. If the Congress ever intends, as it surely does, to regain the powers granted it by the fathers, of which it is now temporarily deprived by bureaucratic encroachment, now is the time to start upon such a campaign by defeating by a decisive majority the bill now offered for your consideration.

The right of petition is rarely addressed by the people to Congress nowadays, but rather to the bureaus. No longer do we hear about the powerful congressional lobbies in Washington. Why? Because lobbying is dead? No! The lobbyists live and in their invisible habiliments and at proper intervals swoop down upon the Capitol as of yore, but instead of lobbying Congress they lobby the bureaus. Let a powerful bureau once take up a cause to be lobbied, then the legislative marauders can return to their usual haunts well satisfied that the bureau will put the legislation through Congress.

The practice of bureaucrats edging themselves into committee rooms to render their smug opinions and deliver their hearsay evidence in the capacity of lobbyists is, if I mistake not, in the growing opinion of the Members of this House, riding to a fall.

Bureaucracy is un-American. The conditions to-day in Russia are largely due to the evils of bureaucratic control under the Czar.

Government bureaus, especially those located in Washington, are far removed from the people, who do not understand the method of approach. Most of them do not have the money or the means to present their case to the bureau. Those who advocate from day to day and degree by degree the passage of laws creating autocracy by the establishment of bureaus may rejoice that the ordinary man is prevented from easy access to his Government; but such a condition, if allowed to continue, means eventual distrust and disaster. To-day in this country the common people are nearer in touch with the Government through their Members of Congress, elected directly by them, than through any other avenue. Every time you weaken Congress by the establishment of a bureau in which the authority of Congress is lessened, you lay one more stone in the erection of the temple of autocracy. Remove the Congress and autocracy is complete. These bureaus are not only legislating by administrative processes but are usurping the power and prerogatives of the people's courts. There are more decisions rendered, and even then without due process of law, affecting the lives, liberty, and property of the people of this country in the bureaus than there are in the courts of the land. When once an opinion is given by a bureau, it is regarded by such bureau, and especially by the person who wrote it, as not only the soundest but also the supreme law of the land. To-day between the black-cloth books on the shelf in the inaccessible back office of the modern bureaucrat is impounded the greater part of the rules of action for the people, which formerly were found between the covers of sheep-bound books in any lawyer's library, or in any judge's chamber, throughout the country.

A celebrated gentleman at the other end of the Capitol the other day said, "Every time we get a recommendation from the Federal Reserve Board it is for expansion." In this very bill before us this board is delegated power in 26 different and distinct items.

This bill furnishes an admirable example of lobbying legislation and expansion by executive process. It is not an opinion to be indulged in that bureaus originate ideas because they are the first to present plans to us, nor in the case of this bill, although written by the attorney for the Federal Reserve Board, is it to be presumed that either he or the board originated the ideas and purposes of the bill. Far from it.

LEGISLATION FOR PLUTUS.

Plutus is the greatest and most successful lobbyist the world has ever known. He insists on monopolizing more than two-thirds of the time used in congressional action with his wants. He generally appears before our committees by bureaucratic proxy. He has never admitted that he desires to make money through legislative enactment; oh, no; he has brains. He is always unselfishly concerned with the public interest. If he desires to increase the flow of oil into his tanks he seeks legislation merely to conserve its supply for the benefit of the people. If he contemplates apprehending a water-power site he does so because he is so horrified to think that the water is running to waste. He is concerned because the farmer needs fertilizer (at his figures). He would conserve all resources (for himself). The water-power site, if he is permitted to seize it, will, of course, be a burden to him, but will incidentally furnish nitrogen for those who need it and pulp and paper for the newspapers. In fact, as developed by the arguments of his bureaucratic propaganda, if he is permitted to lay his hands on the resources of the country everything worthy will be accomplished, but he will make no money.

Should Plutus be interested in and behind such legislation at a time when the people of the country are pressed and gouged by the profiteers and in dire distress, he then argues that his scheme will reduce the high cost of living, and if his scouting for favors is in time of war it will be highly patriotic to accede to his wishes.

THE CONCEPTACLE OF MONEY-MAKING LEGISLATION.

It may be impossible to mark the exact spot where exists the conceptacle of money-gathering legislation. There is, however, such a concatenation of ideas, desires, and ambitions among the disciples of Plutus causing such a friendliness and community of interest feeling as to be quite marvelous. Their morale in action is wonderful. No bureau, board, or commission of the Government has been known to withhold against them. The smile of Plutus, backed by the pamphleteers and the press, will bend the stiffest back of a bureaucrat into a bow such as the Russian peasant was wont to use when he addressed his landlord as "Your nobility."

The case before us is not an exception to the rule. I do not charge corruption. The members of the Federal Reserve Board are honest men. They are all honorable men. I do say, however, that they are not the originators of this legislation, but that the same was pointed out to them not by the farmers, not by the mechanics, and not by the great masses of the country, who carry upon their backs the mistakes of the Nation, but by those who toil not, nor spin, and whose habitat is in the vicinity of old Trinity Church, in the city of New York. This bill sprang from the loins of the money kings. Its first introduction into society was at the Fifth National Foreign Trade Convention, held at Cincinnati in April, 1918, and held under the auspices of the National Foreign Trade Council, India House, Hanover Square, New York City, at which convention it was resolved that "the bill providing Federal charters for banks engaged in foreign trade should be enacted into law." At the same time there was great rejoicing in the convention over the fact that Congress had just passed the Webb bill, companion piece of this bill, the two of which may well be called, for reasons following, the "Twin sisters of darkness."

THE TWIN SISTERS OF DARKNESS.

Let us examine briefly, first, the provisions of the Webb law; secondly, the provisions of the bill under consideration; and thirdly, the effect of the propositions involved in both, in operation at the same time.

The Webb law is more particularly described as "An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes," approved April 10, 1918. (Public, No. 126, 65th Cong.)

This law provides that associations "entered into for the sole purpose of engaging in export trade, and actually engaging solely in such export trade, or an agreement made or act done in the course of such export trade by such association"—not in restraint of trade in the United States—are exempted and freed from the operation, pains, and penalties of the United States statute known as the Sherman antitrust law, more definitely referred to as "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890.

The Webb Act therefore renders legal that which before its passage was illegal, to wit, contracts, combinations, and conspiracies in restraint of trade and commerce, the creating and fostering of monopolies, interlocking and dummy directorates, rebating, price fixing, forestalling, pooling, traffic associations, blackmailing, and boycotting.

In addition to the exemptions granted to these associations and agreements made under the Webb law they are exempted from the operation of section 7 of the Clayton Act, being "An act to supplement existing laws against restraints and monopolies and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914 (Public, No. 212, 63d Cong.), thereby rendering legal that which before the passage of the Webb law was illegal, to wit, the acquisition or ownership by any corporation of the whole or any part of the stock or other capital of any corporation organized solely for the purpose of engaging in export trade and actually engaged solely in such export trade, unless the effect of such acquisition of ownership may be to restrain trade or substantially lessen competition in the United States.

As to the bill before us, it is a very serious and at least a debatable question whether or not the associations or so-called banks to be organized under it are not included in the exemptions from the Sherman Antitrust Act, or at least could be so organized as to be included in the exemption under that act in the same manner and to the same extent as are the Webb corporations. For it will be noted that organizations formed under this bill are required only to be engaged principally in foreign financial operations; that is, they are to be chiefly or mainly so engaged. They may therefore be engaged in foreign financial operations 51 per cent and in the exportation of goods or some other business 49 per cent. A Webb concern is a mere unincorporated association, which can operate under and in conjunction with and as an integral department of a corporation organized under this bill. In fact, it is authorized to pursue various objects not inconsistent with law. An agreement between the financial department and the export department would be nothing more than "an agreement made or act done in the course of export trade" (see Webb law), and if so it is exempted from the operation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, as I believe it was intended should be done when the Webb bill was prepared for Congress in April, 1918. They, too, will then be permitted to indulge in all the legerdemain prohibited by the Sherman Antitrust Act and permitted by the Webb law except as to interlocking directorates, which are regulated by section 8 of the Clayton Act with two liberalizing amendments put to the bill by the House Committee on Banking and Currency and found on page 11 of the bill, lines 1 to 14, inclusive, which, however, allows a director of a member bank of a Federal reserve bank which owns stock in one of these contraptions to be a director in the same, and permits a director in another concern if his association owns stock in another similar company.

But even if the Edge company is not so exempted from the operation of the Sherman antitrust law it can nevertheless so associate itself with a Webb corporation or corporations in foreign financial operations as to exempt it from its provisions, and this without the violation of any law. The right hand will know not what the left hand does. The intertwining of the various elements of organizations under the Webb law and those contemplated by this bill can not be prevented. There is nothing to stop the gradual absorption of all Webb corporations and Edge corporations into one great whole—the greatest and most powerful trust the world has ever seen.

A corporation organized under the Webb Act can (1) purchase and hold any number of shares of stock in any one or more corporations proposed under this act; (2) any one or more of the stockholders in a Webb corporation can purchase and hold one or any number of shares of stock in corporations proposed by this act; (3) purchase and hold the bonds and debentures in Edge corporations; (4) purchase and hold stock in all other export or Webb companies.

A corporation organized under this bill can:

(1) Purchase and hold stock in Webb corporations (but not in other corporations organized under this bill or in corporations doing a similar business organized under State laws if the same are in substantial competition with the purchasing corporation). The Webb corporations are not in substantial competition with the corporations organized under this act and therefore Edge corporations or their stockholders can purchase one or any number of shares in a Webb corporation. In fact the stocks of both classes of corporations are interchangeable.

(2) The Edge corporations organized hereunder may receive deposits from any or all of the export corporations organized under the Webb law.

An association under the Webb law may be initiated, organized, and put into successful operation, according to a speech made by Mr. George H. Charles, of the American Rolling Mills, before the Fifth National Foreign Trade Convention, by carrying out the following suggestions:

If it is proposed to organize a district export selling company under the Webb law the first thing to be done is to call a meeting of 5 or 10 leading exporters of the district in which it is proposed to operate. These exporters can meet informally and discuss the general outlines of organization and operation. The geographical extent of the district will naturally vary with the requirements of the district. Each district should have a central or hub city. A district in southern Ohio probably would have Cincinnati as a central city and take in, geographically, territory having due reference to the railways which might be inclosed conveniently in that district.

With the regular organization completed, a good business man should be secured and a close study begun of foreign trade. The lists of foreign houses in the hands of all the members should be compiled and sent to the central office for the benefit of all the members. Weekly or monthly meetings should be held for the benefit of all members in the district, and representatives to travel in foreign countries employed. The manufacturers in the district should deal only with the district manager.

The business of all manufacturers in one district who do business in one country—i. e., Brazil—should be merged. Warehouses in foreign countries and also the hub city should be rented or erected. An extension of credit is necessary to compete with foreign buyers.

After the organization of one section into a district export-selling company similar companies can be organized in other geographical districts, which would all join together. It is necessary to set aside a large fund for advertising the export products of the districts.

The advantages of this sort of a combination are unlimited. A foreign sales organization is effected and a list of foreign buyers, their needs and requirements obtained. American stocks can be carried in foreign and American warehouses, and the manufacturers do not compete with each other in foreign markets.

These district companies form a nucleus for larger and more pretentious selling companies.

If these Webb corporations are in need of and expect the financial aid of the corporations organized under this act, a fact which is not admitted, because there is sufficient law to take care of them already, then their interests are vital to and dependent upon one another and their close financial intimacy in the business of making money for themselves will soon cause them, as it did the railroads, the oil companies, the sugar companies, and other companies engaged in domestic commerce in the days prior to the passage of the Sherman antitrust law, to seek closer comradeship, which is permitted to them when we pass this act, although such close association may be as injurious to the interest of the people now as it was then.

A glance at that period is given us by Senator John Sherman in the Senate March 24, 1890 (p. 2560, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD):

Senator SHERMAN. * * * The railroads were then too powerful to be dealt with. They combined together. There was one striking case, which I introduced in my argument the other day, where they gave a single other corporation in the combine the advantage of $5,400,000 a year in one transportation contract.

Senator GEORGE. What other corporation now, besides the Standard Oil Co., located at Cleveland, Ohio, is in the Standard Oil combination?

Senator SHERMAN. I am not prepared to say; but an examination was made into this matter by a committee of the other House, of which Mr. Bacon was chairman, and, I think, in the report which was made he gave a list of the corporations, and if I am not mistaken there were 40 or 50, all interlaced with each other, having different interests nominally, different incorporators, different charters. I think there are 40 or 50 great combinations. I do not know the exact number, but perhaps some gentleman who has gone into the reading of that report may be able to answer.

So with the other combinations. I do not wish to single out the Standard Oil Co., which is a great and powerful corporation, composed in great part of citizens of my own State and some of the very best men I know of. Still they are controlling and can control the market as absolutely as they choose to do it; it is a question of their will. The point for us to consider is whether, on the whole, it is safe in this country to leave the production of property, the transportation of our whole country, to depend upon the will of a few men sitting at their council board in the city of New York, for there the whole machine is operated.

After this stand John Sherman no longer trod the "primrose path" in politics.

The exponent of the American Rolling Mills has pointed out the way district export companies may be formed and put in operation, and it is very easy to see how soon they will spread themselves over the entire Nation. In an endeavor to illustrate the facilities afforded the Webb corporations and the Edge corporations to combine and recombine, and finally coalesce into one great and harmonious whole, let us organize right here nine Webb corporations:

First. The Sunset Foreign Export Association, taking in the Pacific coast.

Second. The Rocky Mountain Co., including the Rocky Mountain region.

Third. The Blue Rapids Exports Co., taking in the State of Kansas and the lesser States surrounding it.

Fourth. The Ozark Exporting Concern, taking in the Ozark regions.

Fifth. The Southern Co. of Foreign Exporters.

Sixth. The Roger Williams Co., taking in Rhode Island and the territory within the zone of its influence.

Seventh. The Ohio River Exporters' Association.

Eighth. The Mississippi Valley Exporting Co.

Ninth. The Massesoit Co. of New England.

Then let us organize three Edge corporations to operate under the terms of this bill:

First. The Unlimited Bank of Nations.

Second. The Immeasurable Banking Institution.

Third. The Greatest Bank on Earth.

Mr. Charles has pointed out already that a selling company for all would be a good thing for all. So in our steps to organize a giant trust we may organize a new Webb association to sell the products, and the stock of all district associations could be put in the selling company as a holding company or as an operating company owning the shares of all district companies in the United States and its Territories and dependents. That of itself would be a fair-sized corporation. A corporation being needed to finance these companies and the selling companies, the same owners of stock in the district and selling company could organize an Edge corporation, as they would have no trouble in raising almost any sum among the district companies. If all the district companies were interested in a certain bank organized under this law now under consideration, they would, of course, control it, and the trust is then cumulated in this bank, which not only has the authority to do a foreign banking business as its principal activity, but is permitted to engage in other businesses, which would include joint enterprises with the combination of Webb associations.

But it is more than likely that the great international bank will be formed by those who control the bulk of the money in this country rather than those who control the bulk of the exports. Such financial interests would dominate the export companies. The combination would probably be the result of a more gradual growth.

Under the fourth power above mentioned as being given under the Webb Act, to wit, the right of any Webb export association to purchase and hold any number of shares in any other like concern, it would not be long before Director Spreckels, of the Sunset Foreign Export Association, would load his grip with proxies and powers of attorney and proceed to Denver, where in conversation with Mr. Tabor, one of the principal stockholders and a director in the Rocky Mountain Co., there would be organized, in the interest of economy, efficiency, and coordination, "for the good of the order," a combination of the two companies, either represented by a new concern or, if a matter of convenience, with interlocking or dummy directors, operated ostensibly as two separate concerns.

In the meantime the same character of negotiations had been taking place between Mr. Otis, representing the Ozark Exporting Concern, and Mr. Birmingham, of the Southern Co., into which arrangement the Mississippi Co., by the influence of Mr. Flood, was admitted in good standing. There also has been effected an organization through the good offices of Mr. Long, of the Ohio River Exporting Co., and Mr. Fitzgerald, of the Massesoit Co., to which has been added the Roger Williams Co. through the kindness of Mr. Aldrich.

Therefore our nine companies, or trusts, as originally organized, are now controlled by three combinations, there being three original companies in each of the new organizations. Interchanging of stock has taken place between them and interlocking dummy directorates established, to the satisfaction of all concerned.

While these combinations have been forming, a Mr. Loeb, one of the influential directors and president of the Unlimited Bank of Nations, of New York, and who has been financing some foreign transactions for the respective associations of Mr. Spreckels, Mr. Tabor, and Mr. Strong, all of them now operating as a whole concern, and from whom he has received huge deposits, is in a very prosperous condition. A closer money-gathering arrangement suddenly arises in Mr. Loeb's mind. Spreckels, Tabor, and Strong come on to New York City. All parties desire a combination with each other. It is found that the Unlimited Bank of Nations has power to purchase and hold stock in the Sunset, Rocky Mountain, and Blue Rapids companies, being mere incorporated associations, provided they are not in substantial competition with his purchasing corporation, his Edge corporation, the Unlimited Bank. They are, of course, not in such competition, and the combination is made, the trust is formed. The example set by Mr. Loeb is soon followed by the organization composed of the Ozark, Southern, and Mississippi Valley combinations, to make a similar arrangement with a certain Edge corporation, which has had their deposits and with which they have been doing business, to wit, the Immeasurable Banking Institution of Mr. Crœsus. Thereupon, under like conditions and circumstances, the Ohio, Roger Williams, and Massesoit companies arrange with the greatest bank on earth.

Now, while we increase in strength we decrease in number, and the whole field is represented by three big combinations which are not apparent to the nearsighted eye of the public.

The next thing is a nice little dinner at Banker Loeb's mansion. Foreign Export Merchants Spreckels, Tabor, Strong, Otis, Birmingham, Flood, Long, Fitzgerald, and Aldrich are there. Friend Loeb, the host, and Foreign Bankers Crœsus and Rogers, who have grown fat by virtue of the Edge law, grace the occasion. The great constitutional lawyer, statesman, and scholar, Elijah Rutabagar, for a slight consideration, has dropped in, together with those personages of lesser minds but "men who do things" (to the public), the law firm of Hooker, Skinner & Chadbourn, who sit in quiet attention. It is not for me to further describe this dinner, save to say that the statesman, scholar, etc., being called upon, arose, slightly cleared his throat, and spoke briefly, giving a few suggestions, to the great delight of all.

In less than 10 days it was given to the press through the Skinner law office that an organization had been effected which would take over all the stocks of all the aforesaid corporations, combinations, and trusts into one great mother corporation, to be called the Omnipotent Securities Co., at the head of which as president would be placed that great financier and friend of the people generally, J. Rufus Wallingford.

The common people—the farmers, producers, and all manufacturers not on the inside—are astounded. Confusion twice confounded reigns, and they cry aloud, "What can be done?" An echo answers with that old, familiar sound, "How can you unscramble eggs?"

DESTRUCTION OF AMERICAN INDUSTRIES.

The passage of this bill means the destruction of many American industries. If combinations are formed as I have hereinbefore pointed out, it is very easy to see the ruin of American manufacturing concerns who do not or can not enter the combine. No single manufacturer could compete with such a monopoly, and he would be driven to the wall, his business ruined, and his factories fall into decay, just as they did when these great trusts were formed prior to the enactment of the Sherman antitrust law. There is hardly a town in America to-day which can not show you the ruins of some factory which used to help support the town prior to its ruination or purchase and demolition by the trust. Citizens of these villages point mournfully to the deserted and windowless buildings of what used to be a flouring or steel mill or some other active and town-supporting industry before the trust laid upon it the cold hand of death.

If it is a fact, as claimed by the friends of this bill, that these institutions formed under this act will be the means of financing corporations in foreign countries, then we should call a halt before it is too late. Why should the American Congress legislate to tear down industry in the United States and build it up in foreign countries? Yet that this will be attempted as soon as this bill becomes the law, which I trust will not be the case, there is not a shadow of a doubt. That is what this bill is for. There never has been a greater blow struck behind the back of American industry than the attempt to foist this legislation into the statutes. In fact, this ruinous campaign has already started.

Mr. David Lubin, an authority who styles himself delegate to the United States International Institute of Agriculture,

Rome, is a pamphleteer who is more concerned in building up foreign rather than American industry, having in mind, no doubt, the plans of those who secured the passage of the Webb bill, and finally brought this bill to its present status in the House says, in a pamphlet issued by him on November 5, 1918:

It needs no elaborate argument to show the economic advantage of steam and electric power and machinery over hand labor. By far the greater part of the world is still producing its goods by hand labor. We should do all in our power to displace these handmade goods by machine-made * * * but how displace? We have made but little progress by pushing our goods through the means of commercial travelers with their sample trunks.

Mr. Lubin then points out what he calls the line of approach:

Briefly, then, the approach is through the upbuilding of manufacturing centers with their factories in the countries where it would be an economic advantage to replace handmade goods by machine-made goods. Such factories should be under local ownership and direction, which would soon overcome prejudice against change from handmade to machine-made goods.

How could such manufacturing centers with their factories be built up?

Would the local initiative suffice?

No; it would not; the potentialities would be there, but they will have to be awakened, supplemented by American cooperation by Americans. We should make it our business to take a hand in building up such American expert guidance, and right here is our opportunity.

I should say our opportunity to divest ourselves of our manufacturing institutions and transplant them in Europe.

We should make it our business to take a hand in building up such factories and in directing and supervising them until local labor, local direction, and local management becomes sufficiently competent and expert to run them. * * * Under the proposed plan the foreign trade markets of the world would be divided into zones, each with one or more manufacturing centers, each of which will be designated as an industrial and distribution base for the zones. Take, for instance, the Mediterranean Basin as one of these zones. Draw a line from Gibraltar to Syria and let the countries north, south, and east of that line form that zone with Italy as its base. Similar zones could be formed in other parts of the world, as, for instance, in Central America, in South America, and in Russia.

Let each base in a zone be placed on an up-to-date industrial footing; let the factories be provided with the most effective modern machinery. Let each industry be placed on a sound financial basis and, above all, let it be placed under skilled, expert direction. This proposal is now practically working in Italy. It has been under discussion by leading Italians and the Italian ministry. It has met with general favor. A hearing was had with Ambassador Page, who seemed favorably impressed. As a result of the meeting it was decided to go ahead with the plan. It was approved on October 16, 1918, by the Italian minister of commerce, at which meeting leading Italians were present. The plan was approved. It was decided that an effort be made to have Italy become engaged for the commercial and industrial development of the Mediterranean Basin on modern lines and to ask the aid of the American people toward bringing this about. A committee was appointed, with Ernesto Nathan, former mayor of Rome, as chairman. In response to requests for adherents this committee has received favorable replies from bodies representing leading industries, among them the metallurgical, the engineering, the silk, and the cotton-spinning industries. A meeting will shortly be called to effect a permanent organization for the purpose of proceeding on with the work in Italy, when an endeavor will be made to interest the American people in the proposal.

The money-making contingent are rapidly getting in line. They are very forward-looking men. Patriotism disassociated from profits is no shibboleth for them. If more money can be gathered for their individual use, it matters not whether America profits or not. Witness the commencement of the exodus of factories, as indicated in an article published in the Scientific American, October 18, 1919:

AMERICAN SILK TROUBLES.

The exodus of Italian workingmen returning to Italy has seriously affected the silk industry in the United States, which is handicapped by an increasing shortage of skilled workmen. Thousands are said to have left the manufacturing centers of this country. There have been reports that American manufacturers contemplate the establishment of silk-manufacturing plants in Italy, and several arguments in favor of such a plan have been brought forward. Skilled workers are scarce in this industry, whereas in Italy not only is labor more plentiful but it is believed that it will be possible to attract returned immigrants who have been trained in American mills. Water power may be used in Italy all year round, and the cost of transporting raw material would be saved by locating near the point of production.

The Washington Post of October 29, 1919, says that Arthur J. Belding, vice president of the McGraw-Hill Publishing Co., will move his plant to Germany, and we know that Mr. Henry Ford, another forward-looking man, will construct a factory in Cork. This bill, if it will finance anything, would be a great aid and comfort to the emigration of American industries to foreign soil.

THE PAUPERIZATION OF AMERICAN LABOR.

If this bill were the law, the concerns organized under it would be enabled to finance foreign factories—not only those which might be removed from this country and operated with American capital, but also those which are organized in foreign countries, composed in part or in whole of foreign manufacturers, financed by American money, will spring up almost overnight and flourish like green bay trees. The secret of the popularity of this form of industrial activity, of course, proceeds from the ability of these concerns to operate with cheap foreign labor. They could thereby produce the goods for the foreign market much cheaper than could be done in America and increase the profits a thousandfold. The American laborer must then accept an increase in his hours of labor or a great reduction in his pay, or perhaps both, to enable his employer who stays with his industry in America to live.

Mr. Baldwin gave as a reason why he would move his factory to Germany that the workmen there worked 10 hours a day and "at a reasonable wage." The situation which could thus be created is beyond the imagination to contemplate. Not only the workingmen but the middle classes would become vagabonds. There is no prospect or possibility of the American laborer, who constitutes a large part of the middle class and maintains a decent standard of living, competing with the Chinese coolie trained to use machinery. Do you think he could compete with the Armenian? This he will have to do if this bill becomes a law. Already our money is blazing the way into Armenia. It will not be long before the Armenian manufacturers, financed under this bill, if passed, and operating with the cheapest sort of labor trained to machinery, will be in the foreign market as our competitors.

THE WEAKENING OF THE HOME MARKET.

It has always been the policy of our Government to maintain at all costs a strong and healthy home market not only for our manufacturers but for our producers. With thousands of factories self-expatriated, fed by American money, and with concerns organized under this bill and the Webb law combined and properly financed, the home market becomes a secondary consideration, especially so if foreign manufacturers are financed with American money. The effect of lowering American wages to meet the competition of foreign pauper labor would so hurt the purchasing power of the average worker that the American market, composed largely of such workers, would be rendered barren as a field for the successful disposition of our wares. The bread line and soup houses would again appear and gaunt misery stalk the land in "the days when the doors shall be shut in the street and the sound of the grinding be low."

In a bulletin issued in 1916 the Federal Trade Commission admits that American factories not members of the combination will be hurt because they can not do business as cheaply as the combination, and states that the combination "is clearly entitled to such business whether it gets it at the expense of some foreign rival or of an American competitor," and admits certain dangers in that the combination might be used to exploit consumers in the home market and that it might be used unfairly against the American concerns in the export trade not members of the organizations. The board at this time evidently did not have presented to it the possible self-expatriation of thousands of American factories, nor the employment of American capital abroad in cooperation with cheap labor to compete with American goods in foreign markets.

The farmer and stock raiser has nothing to gain and everything to lose from the passage of a bill which will facilitate the exploitation of his home market and offers him nothing but the fun of chasing the fantasy of foreign trade, and the stockman will find himself confronted with an organization in form the same as the packers' combine but larger and more effective. In control of the export market, the farmer and stockman will be told from day to day, in the foreign market report in the New York and Chicago exchanges, the prices for which he will sell his produce and live stock in the foreign market. Can any man argue that a huge combination of the kind described and in absolute control of foreign trade will, for a moment, pay to the farmer or stock raiser anything but the lowest price? Is there anyone who thinks that after they have purchased of the farmer that they will not sell their purchase for the highest price obtainable? Is there anyone so foolish as to wager that the consumer will receive any of the difference? No; there will be no reduction in price to the consumer, although what the farmer sells is brought to the lowest possible figures. All is designed to go to the trust. How plain it is, then, that the power and authority given these combinations, financed accordingly, to absolutely fix the price of goods sold on the foreign market, when exercised, must have a tremendous effect on prices of necessities in the United States, and this whether the combinations "conspire" or not. You can try to regulate such effect by penalties, but you can no more control it than King Canute did the tides of the sea, and you can no more regulate this operation than you could modify the laws of gravitation or change the procession of the equinoxes.

THE MAINTENANCE OF THE HIGH COST OF LIVING.

It is my belief that a single trust such as can be created in a night out of the Webb corporations and financed the next day under this bill, operating, you might say, "with the lid off," in dealing with foreign exports, without subjecting itself to a prosecution for conspiracy under this act, will by reason of its unlimited control over exports be able to maintain the present high cost of living and this without the slightest improvement in the condition of the producer. This is illustrated by a cloakroom rumor, the truth of which I will not vouch for, to the effect that a company of forward-looking men had purchased a shipload of shoes from an American manufacturer which usually retail in this country at about $9 per pair at such a figure that they could be sold abroad for about $4.98 per pair, the essence of the contract being that none of them should be sold in this country. If enough shoes were dumped on our market, some citizen of these United States could in a slight degree reduce his cost of living by securing the same at a reasonable price. The policy since the war of holding vast stocks in store is to-day maintaining the high cost of living, and when the facilities are made ready vast stores will be exported and withdrawn from the American market. The self-expatriation of American factories, the pauperization of labor, and the exploitation of the home market speak a dark day for the original producer and the ultimate consumer in these United States.

THE ACME OF WILDCATTING.

I was glad that on Saturday the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON], in his admirable address on this bill, pointed out that there were two features of this bill, and that one of them pertained to "investment bankers." This suggestion of his brings up for discussion the most dangerous part of this bill. As a matter of fact there is no need for these Edge concerns at the present time, so far as legitimate and sound foreign banking is concerned. That feature is amply taken care of by the foreign branch bank section of the Federal reserve act, and such branch banks are growing rapidly in foreign countries. They are found in South America, Haiti, France, and England, and furthermore the War Finance Corporation can take care of the situation so far as credits are concerned, and it is authorized to do so until one year after the termination of the war, as fixed by the proclamation of the President, all of which is indicated in a report by the director of said corporation to the Senate, dated October 11, 1919, in compliance with Senate resolution 204. Furthermore Mr. H. P. Davison, of the Morgan firm, has stated that this bill would not stabilize exchange.

Therefore there is no reason for the passage of this act except for the benefit of the "investment banker."

In the outset I said that the first paragraph of this bill is the whole bill, for here is where the so-called investment banker is permitted to immerse himself in immortal reservoirs of wealth. What is an investment banker? In the first place, he is not a banker. He is a broker or, in other words, an investment speculator. The words "New York investment banker" is just a polite word for a New York stock jobber, and this bill is for their particular benefit. There is no place in the bill where their speculation as brokers in foreign investments is regulated, defined, or controlled. It might be well called a bill for the protection of stock jobbers in their international speculations. Contemplating a big business in the sale of foreign wildcat stocks in America for good American coin, they have begun an agitation in this Congress to pass a bill to prevent the further sale of our native brand of wildcat securities in competition with them.

If there is a rumor that oil has been found in Armenia, that will be sufficient for the organization and promotion by these so-called investment bankers of hundreds of companies the sale of whose stocks and bonds they will promote. If a craze for Siberian gold overcomes us, those who are taken care of in this bill will see to it that the stock and bonds of the Siberian Gold Mining Co. get a fair chance in America.

We may expect to see promoted a factory for manufacturing the free energy of Garabed Giragossian in the Kingdom of the Hedjaz. Plantations of coffee in Brazil will offer them a chance to promote their stock. Associations for raising corn and cattle in Argentina will be a popular sort of investment offered the American people. The almond tree in Palestine will flourish, and so will the sale of the stock. The Spanish armada will be raised and the mines of King Solomon will be reopened. Stock and bonds on highly satisfactory terms, as advertised in the newspapers, in factories, mines, railroads, and canals in European, Asiatic, African, and South American companies will be offered to the American public. As after every great war people are anxious to engage in a stock-buying hysteria, so it would seem America is about to become the victim which will be largely caused and promoted by this enabling bill, supplemented by a first-class advertising campaign.

The first proposition in sight, as stated in the public press, is to the effect that experts are engaged in planning a modern scientific city outside the walls of Jerusalem. The prospectus shows that "the features of the ancient city will be preserved intact, while around it will be built a modern city of American type, with skyscrapers, trolley cars, modern hotels, drainage, water supply, factories, theaters, and everything that could be desired. Thus the resident or visitor will be able to employ the opportunity of examining when he pleases the world's most sacred and picturesque city while living under conditions of modern comfort." The price of stock and bonds await the passage of this bill.

Recent events, as well as recent and modern history, teach us that the psychology of peoples has to do in a most important manner with their activities. In nations struggling under great war debts the tendency is toward speculation. Are we prepared to facilitate the selling of speculative stocks, the propagation of which will be magnified by our master geniuses of advertising so as to cause our people to desert the safe and sane methods involved in the purchase of home securities and plunge headlong into an insane saturnalia of foreign speculation?

Permit me to call attention, as a warning, to two instances in history: I refer first to the great stock-speculating epidemic which seized possession of the people of France in the early part of the eighteenth century, relating to a project known as "the Mississippi scheme," initiated by John Law, a Scotch "investment banker," whose scheme, approved by the regent, for the establishment of a company having exclusive privilege of "trading to the great river, Mississippi, and the Province of Louisiana, on its western bank," which territory was supposed to abound in precious metals, after being supported in a delirium of enthusiasm by the people of that country, fell with a crash.

Visions of great wealth took possession of the people. Shares advanced rapidly. A frenzy of speculation began. Issues of new shares from time to time added to the delusion. It affected the highest and lowest classes. Dukes, counts, duchesses, and countesses jostled daily with the proletariat in the narrow street before Law's house clamoring for stock. Apartments were rented in the locality at fabulous rates. Many accidents occurred in the alley, and the crowd was so great that a cobbler in the street made a fortune by letting his stall out and furnishing writing materials to applicants for stock, and a humped-back man who stood in the street gained a considerable sum by lending his hump as a writing desk for eager speculators. Later, when Law moved to the Hotel d'Soissons, tents were erected in the gardens in order to furnish places where stock jobbers and their clients could be early accommodated with stock. Courtiers, peers, judges, and bishops thronged his apartment for stock.

At the apex of the speculation some one demanded payment in specie. He was berated at first by the frenzied multitude, but soon others imitated him, and stocks began to fall, and people doubted the immense wealth of the Mississippi region. A run on the bank occurred, 15 persons being crushed to death in the doors of the bank. They demanded possession of Law and that he be torn to pieces. Thousands were rendered penniless, while a very few, who had disposed of their stocks early, gathered up their ill-gotten gains and departed from the country.

Another great delirium in stock speculating took possession of England in the early part of the same century, and was known as the South Sea bubble. Pope describes the times in the following language:

> At length corruption, like a general flood,
> Did deluge all, and avarice, creeping on,
> Spread, like a low-born mist, and hid the sun.
> Statesmen and patriots plied alike the stocks,
> Peeress and butler shared alike the box;
> And judges jobbed, and bishops bit the town,
> And mighty dukes packed cards for half a crown:
> Britain was sunk in lucre's sordid charms.

The South Sea Co. was given a monopoly of trade to the South Seas. It was one of the first foreign export trade corporations and by its propaganda everyone believed in the stories of inexhaustible gold and silver mines in Peru and along the eastern coast of South America.

The plan was to make everybody rich simply by sending English manufacturers to be repaid one hundredfold in gold and silver ingots by the natives. New concessions being granted from time to time by the Government, the stock arose with great rapidity at every discussion of the legislation. Mr. Robert Walpole alone stood out boldly against it. He claimed amid derision that the "dangerous practice of stockjobbing would divert the genius of the nation from trade and industry. It would lure to decay the unwary to their ruin by causing them to part with the hard earnings of their labor for the prospects of imaginary wealth." He prophetically declared "that if the plan proposed succeeded the directors would become the masters of the Government and control the action of the legislature." He was hailed as a false prophet and compared to the hoarse raven, croaking omens of evil.

Nevertheless the whole nation turned stockjobbers. "Exchange Alley was blocked and Cornhill was impassable."

The inordinate thirst for gold could not be slaked, even in the South Sea.

Other promotion schemes of the wildcat kind were initiated. Bubbles sprang up everywhere and burst in a week or less.

Stock companies to make "deal boards out of sawdust," "a wheel for perpetual motion," "encouraging the breed of horses," "for improving glebe and church lands and repairing and rebuilding parsonage and vicarage houses," "carrying on wholesale fisheries in Greenland," "improving British alum works," "trading in hair," for "a settlement on the island of Vera Cruz," "importing walnut trees from Virginia," "employing poor artificers and furnishing merchants and others with watches," "colonization of Arcadia," and for many other extravagant purposes, were formed.

But the greatest of all concerns was one started by an unknown adventurer (and I do not make an application of his scheme to this bill), a concern entitled "A corporation for carrying on an undertaking of great advantage, but nobody to know what it is."

Finally, as in France, the storm broke.

"A most extraordinary panic seized upon the people. Men were running to and fro in alarm and terror, their imagination filled with great calamity, the form and dimension of which nobody knew."

Black it stood as night—
Fierce as 10 furies—
Terrible as hell.

Parliamentary inquiry disclosed a "degree of infamy, disgraceful alike to the morals of the offenders and the intellect of the people—a warning that nations like individuals can not become desperate gamblers with impunity."

And so, Mr. Chairman, in view of the great dangers impending upon the passage of this bill, the threatened destruction of American industries, the pauperization of American labor, the maintenance of the present high cost of living, the building and maintaining of American industries in foreign countries whose rights must be protected by the presence of thousands of troops raised among the young men of the country, the probability of great international complications, and the undoubted and certain coming of a national orgy of stock speculation to the ruin of millions, all occurring while the Nation is burdened with debt, suffering from the sorrows and ravages of war, and while general unrest prevails among our people, I plead with the proponents of this bill to withdraw it, and in the event of failure to do so, I appeal to the membership of this House to defeat it. [Applause.]

During the remarks of Mr. KING:

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that the speech which the gentleman from Illinois is delivering is so important that it should be heard by more Members of the House, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DOWELL). The gentleman from Louisiana makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members present, a quorum.

Mr. KING concluded his remarks.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, there now being exactly 28 Members on the floor, not counting the pages, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-four Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2472, and finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, when 212 Members answered to their names—a quorum—and he handed in the list of absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Massachusetts proceeds, I desire to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I was chairman of the Subcommittee on Banking and Currency, which had under consideration the bill which is now before the House for consideration. Every opportunity was given to all of the interests affected by the bill to be heard before the committee. The only opposition which developed seems to have been made manifest through the opposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING]. The gentleman from Illinois expresses the fear that this is going to be a combination in restraint of trade. I think the gentleman is in error in that respect, because I think it is going to help trade in the United States.

The gentleman suggests that it will drive out of trade the small concerns in this country, and that they will be forced to do business with these large combinations of trade, and that that will work a great hardship. To my mind this matter of international trade is a very serious matter and one which I believe people who study the subject will agree with me when I say that no small concern in the United States, with conditions as they are at present, should attempt to enter the foreign trade. When we passed the amendments to the Clayton anti-trust law, under the Webb-Pomerene Act, permitting concerns to combine to do international trade or business, one of the very purposes of the bill is to finance business originating by authority of this Webb-Pomerene Act. Many of these small concerns have not the credit facilities, and great risks are involved should they assume the risks incident to the financing of this foreign business.

The United States to-day is on the eve of the greatest prosperity that it could ever have hoped for. Industrially it expanded to a point beyond all expectations 10 years ago. In natural resources we are superabundant. This country produces 20 per cent of the world's supply of gold, 25 per cent of the world's supply of wheat, 40 per cent of the world's iron and steel, 40 per cent of the world's silver, 50 per cent of the world's zinc, 52 per cent of the world's coal, 60 per cent of the world's aluminum, 60 per cent of the world's cotton, 66 per cent of the world's supply of oil, and 75 per cent of the world's corn. This country refines 80 per cent of the world's copper and operates 40 per cent of the world's railroads.

A harvest of wealth from the farms of this broad, rich land such as has never before been recorded in the world's history is in prospect.

But most valuable of all the stimulus which the dire necessities of war supplied to American inventiveness, resourcefulness, productiveness, courage, and spirit of adventure constitutes a national asset which not only transcends the bounds of material computation, but also challenges the boldest imagination.

Financially, we are in the best position of any country in the world, and our leading competitors in the fight for domination of control in finance are looking to us to-day for loans and credits, and all of the devastated countries of Europe are looking to us for food products and the necessary materials for rehabilitation purposes.

All that is needed in this country to-day is simply constructive Government leadership for and cooperation with business generally to insure full and free development of our unequaled resources and opportunities.

Our exports for the month of June reached the enormous sum of $918,000,000, exceeding by over $200,000,000 the highest previous month's record. Our imports were only $293 000.000, leaving a trade balance of $625,000,000 in our favor. The trade balance in our favor at the end of the last fiscal year, June 30, 1919, was $4.129,000,000. To this should be added the silver which we exported, amounting to $222,000,000. It is true that there has been some decline in the latter months in our exports, but I mention this simply to show that now, notwithstanding the fact that the war has ended, that the demand from the world for the products of this country is continuing in large amounts and will continue for several years to come, providing a definite plan of financing these operations so as to maintain an even balance of exchange and permit the settlement on a proper basis for the products exported, and further providing for the ultimate and future settlement of the operations additionally created.

This situation presents an interesting one when taken into consideration with our own domestic situation as presented by the brotherhoods affecting labor and the increased cost of living in this country. What is needed more than anything else to help solve the situation is increased production. There never was a time in the history of this country when this should be more pertinent than the present. Everyone understands that eventually the United States will get back upon a normal basis.

To return to a normal basis immediately is what is needed, and in order to do this this country must speed up. We have the markets and to supply the markets we have the raw materials, the machinery, and the labor, and the incentive should be accelerated by educating the elements of unrest into a sense of duty to their country to get back immediately to work, and hard work, and forget for the moment the question of equitable readjustment of wages.

Let the United States pull together all of her resources, including raw materials, industry, labor, and finance, and we will so fix the position of the United States that for future years she will be the dominating power in the world. There is every selfish reason why the United States should speed up to her fullest capacity. We have a bonded and floating debt of $30,000,000,000. The interest burden and the increased cost of doing the Government's business occasioned by these new conditions impel us to at the earliest possible moment liquidate our indebtedness. The only way we can hope to do this is by increasing production.

One great trouble in this country to-day is that everyone is looking for a snap—shorter hours, with as little real work as possible, and big wages, good clothes, automobiles. We have been tending toward leisure and extravagance instead of comfort and conservation.

This bill has for its purpose the providing in part the machinery to facilitate the sale to the world of our surplus of production and to provide facilities to enable the world to pay us, which production is now so greatly needed in war-devastated Europe.

In 1920 France wants $750,000.000 worth, Italy wants $600,000,000, and Belgium wants $200,000,000, to say nothing of the demand of England and the other countries, a probable total of $2,000,000.000 which they will want outside of the usual demand, all depending upon our ability to accept the kind of settlement these countries can give.

They have no gold to spare in settlement of the over $4,000,000,000 due us in balance of trade as of June 30 last. To this must be added the present year's increase less our imports, which certainly will not exceed our imports for some years to come, if every again. So that at the end of the next fiscal year we can expect an unsettled balance in our favor of probably $6,000,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit, is the gentleman going to deal with the South American trade?

Mr. McFADDEN. I was not. I was dealing with it as a whole. That is tremendously important, however. This bill will care for South American trade as well as European.

We must not lose sight of the fact, too, that in the past five years we have changed from a debtor to a creditor nation; that instead of our owing the world some $5,000,000,000, the world owes us at least $16,000,000,000, made up of direct war loans to our Allies in the war of $10,000,000,000, as per letter which I insert at this point:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, September 15, 1919.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have your letter of the 9th instant and take pleasure in informing you that the credits established by the Secretary of the Treasury in favor of foreign Governments and cash advanced against these credits as at the close of business September 11, 1919, were as follows:

	Credits established.	Cash advanced.
Belgium	$343,445,000.00	$338,745,000.00
Cuba	10,000,000.00	10,000,000.00
Czechoslovakia	55,330,000.00	52,690,000.00
France	3,047,974,777.24	2,782,477,800.00
Great Britain	4,316,000,000.00	4,277,000,000.00
Greece	48,236,629.05
Italy	1,619,922,872.99	1,600,775,945.99
Liberia	5,000,000.00	18,000.00
Roumania	25,000,000.00	25,000,000.00
Russia	187,729,750.00	187,729,750.00
Serbia	26,780,465.56	26,780,465.56
Total	9,685,419,494.84	9,301,216,951.55

Charges of $188,236,629.05 have been made against these credits in addition to cash advances shown.

Very truly, yours,

ALBERT RATHBONE.

Hon. LOUIS T. McFADDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Also four billions balance of trade are due, and at least $2,000,000,000 of privately negotiated loans held by financial institutions and private investors in the country. A complete turn-over of $21,000,000,000 which we paid to Europe to help her finance the war. It is interesting to add to this amount the total cost to this country of the war, as of June 30, 1919, of $30,177,000,000, or a total of $51,177,000,000, which this country has financed during the past four years.

In considering this situation we should not overlook the effect of the change from a debtor to a creditor nation. The fact that we no longer pay an interest charge to the world of at least $250,000,000 and that we will no longer pay shipping charges to the extent previously paid by us owing to our increased shipping facilities of $150,000,000, and that we will also save another $150,000,000 in insurance premiums, which used to go abroad, a total of $550,000,000, and added to this must be the interest on at least $12,000,000,000, which is owed the Government of the United States and private investors, for which we hold obligations, with interest, which must amount to at least $600,000,000. Add to this what we previously had to pay Europe and you have $1,150,000,000, which Europe must pay this country annually more than before the war.

In other words, the world must pay this amount in gold or merchandise to the United States, which is, of course, a handicap to Europe in dealing with this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield me five minutes?

Mr. PHELAN. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is extended for five minutes.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. BROWNE. In regard to the saving on insurance premiums being sent abroad, I did not just understand how that saving is produced?

Mr. McFADDEN. Before the war this amount of insurance was carried with German and English companies. During the war, of course, the German companies were closed out and the people in the United States are paying more of their insurance premiums to the companies in this country than ever before.

Mr. BROWNE. Does the gentleman know how much that would amount to?

Mr. McFADDEN. The total amount, I suppose, would be $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 which we were paying to foreign companies.

One would certainly think from a careful study of this entire situation that the United States must assume the leadership in finance of the world, a situation not of her own seeking but by the necessity of the occasion, a thing as a country we have a right to be proud of, made possible by the development of our great resources under a form of government such as we are fortunate enough to possess, due to the foresight of our forefathers in so wisely providing under the Constitution, which fact should be a strong argument for the upholding of this Constitution and our Government under it, which has protected our country during all this development and permitted us to attain the present height and supremacy as a world power.

The war cost has been estimated at over $200,000,000,000. The debts of allied countries of Europe are held mostly within their borders, the largest outside credit being to this country.

Germany's debt is likewise held by her own people, with the exception of the indemnity which is to be paid to the allied countries in reparation, which I believe has been agreed upon in the peace treaty as twenty-five billions of dollars in money besides the replacement of much physical property.

In this connection it is interesting to note that Germany will be carrying the burden of paying this country the difference brought about by these changed conditions between this country and the world. Financially the interest charge Germany must pay to our allies will amount to $1,250,000,000 annually. In other words, she must pay in gold or merchandise.

An interesting conclusion might mean that Germany would be paying to this country in merchandise the interest which she owes to our allies to balance that which the Allies may owe us, which she knows so well how to efficiently produce. This, then, in view of the situation, makes the statement "that German labor and industry have gone on a 12-hour per day time"—quite in contrast with our own situation as regards production—very interesting and worthy of our careful consideration.

A study of this world-wide financial situation can not but make for serious thought, and in anticipating what the future has in store for this country one is bound to conclude that the financial requirements of the lesser countries of the world, which heretofore have been financed in London and the other financial centers of the Old World, must of necessity come to this country for that future relief. And I am not sure but in this lies the solution of our intertrade relations with the world. Certainly the opportunity is here. Will we meet it? It is a case of the survival of the fittest. I say that we will meet the issue fairly and squarely and thus assume the financial leadership of the world.

This measure is one step to perfect the machinery with which to operate. We have long been seeking trade with the world, and our opportunity is now here, but with that opportunity comes naturally the responsibility of financing it. Let us meet the challenge as Americans have always met every challenge and go in to conquer and overcome the obstacles and win the victory in finance and trade.

Therefore I think that a combination of capital such as provided for in this bill is absolutely necessary to maintain our foreign business.

Now, we all realize, of course, in the financing of this great volume of business which is knocking at our doors, that some instrument must be created to take care of the payments that those countries in Europe have to give us. This instrument is nothing more than a hopper into which will pour long-time credits which may be in the form of notes, which may be in the form of bonds of municipalities, or bonds or stocks issued by companies in France, England, or other parts of the world, which may be guaranteed or secured by the Governments or municipalities. Into this hopper they will flow, and out of this hopper will flow obligations of this company in a suitable form, a desirable form, for our people to invest their savings in. That is about the sum and substance of what is contemplated under this act. There are other powers given, but they are incident to this main purpose. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield a half minute to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN].

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the signing of the armistice between Italy and Austria and the achievements of the Italian Army in the recent war.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the present bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the present bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reluctantly, I must object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there is nothing more important to the producing masses of America than the continuance of proper facilities for maintaining our foreign trade. There never came to this Nation since its birth, and probably never will come again, a situation so auspicious or so full of opportunity. The conditions confronting us accentuate the necessity for the wisest and most constructive legislative program on the part of the Government, as well as the most far-seeing financial policy on the part of the business men of the country. It is to regretted that on a subject like this, which is in a large sense technical, and, with many Members of the House not present, so many surprising assertions should be indulged in in this discussion. This bill—or substantially this bill—passed the Senate during the last session of Congress. The same measure, without many of the restrictions and safeguards which are offered and reported as amendments to the pending bill, was approved by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency and passed by the Senate during this session. As reported to the House it has the unanimous support of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House, excepting the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING]. There are some able lawyers and experienced and successful bankers on the committees of Congress that have approved this bill. In the face of all this it seems remarkable that only one member of either of these committees should have discovered the alarming tendencies of the bill which have been recited this afternoon by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING].

The situation respecting our foreign trade is such that something should be done to make sure that the farmers and manufacturers of the Nation shall not suffer from a severe slump in our exports and sudden and sweeping decline in prices. We are told that for the fiscal year ending June 30 last our exports exceeded imports between four and five billions of dollars. Our trade during that period, including both imports and exports, reached the stupendous sum of more than $10,000,000,000. This vast volume of business can not be handled to the best advantage of the American people without some new method of international banking. The American dollar has advanced until it is worth $1.12, as it relates to the British pound sterling. In France and Italy it is even much higher, and in Germany higher still. This is bound to result in the impairment of our foreign trade to the great detriment of the cotton growers, the wheat growers, the cattle raisers, the manufacturers, the laborers, and every interest of the American people. We must maintain and increase our production and continue to ship our goods to the markets of the world if we hope to preserve our marvelous prosperity.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] pointed out quite clearly how the present exchange situation affects the producers of this country. Ten thousand pounds sterling is worth $48,600. But if an English firm has to draw exchange with which to buy cotton, or wheat, or cattle, the £10,000 will be worth only $41,500 in this country. This makes a difference of $7,100. This sum represents about 40 bales of cotton at present prices. If we had in operation the banking system which the present bill seeks to establish, the same firm could go to the American branch bank or agency in Liverpool or London and negotiate a loan by putting up securities there which would be handled in this country without this vast loss in exchange. The difference would enable the English firm to pay about 6 cents a pound more for American cotton than under existing conditions. This would mean a saving to American cotton growers of an amount almost equal to the total value of the cotton crop of the United States when the crop used to sell at 7 and 8 cents a pound. The same illustration holds good as to wheat, cattle, and other products.

Our foreign trade is being taken care of now by the operation of policies inaugurated during the war. It is no longer desired, in view of the enormous trade balance in our favor, that the regular banks of the country should undertake to handle this trade. It involves transactions too large, with risks that should not be attempted by the regular banks. We have a banking system that meets every requirement incident to normal conditions in the commercial life of the Nation, and which during the test and strain of the recent war which we were called upon to finance, both for our allies and ourselves, gave us first place in the financial affairs of the world. It has brought a period of prosperity unparalleled in our history, and enabled us to finance and win the greatest war of all time. The Federal reserve act and the Federal farm-loan act have given an impetus to agricultural, industrial, and commercial activity never known before. These acts have given independence to farmers and producers by furnishing an ample supply of credit. The present bill is designed to supplement those great measures of constructive legislation by providing a system that will cover the field of international banking just as those acts have supplied our domestic needs.

The Congress has heretofore authorized the War Finance Corporation to the extent of $1,000,000,000 to take care of the work of carrying on our foreign trade. That bill, as I remember, met with no serious objection. But the Federal Reserve Board and all whose opinion on the subject would be considered of value have concluded that it is not best that the Federal Government shall extend its credit further to assist other nations, even though it be to promote their rehabilitation, upon which our own prosperity in large part must depend.

The Federal reserve act authorized banks with a capital and surplus of a million dollars or more to establish foreign branches, but only one institution has taken advantage of that act by going into foreign-branch business. This was the National City Bank of New York. It has a combined capital, surplus, and undivided profits of nearly $100,000,000. This bank has quite a number of branches doing a large business throughout the world. Later an amendment to the Federal reserve act was passed on September 7, 1916, allowing banks with a capital and surplus of as much as $1,000,000 to take stock in foreign branches or banks engaged in financing foreign trade. Eight foreign-trade banks have been established, to the capital stock of which national banks have subscribed. These institutions are incorporated under State laws and do a banking business, though they do not receive deposits. On September 17, 1919, another amendment to the Federal reserve act was passed giving national banks the right to subscribe not to exceed 5 per cent of their capital and surplus to institutions known as export finance corporations, whether organized under Federal or State laws. The bill before us provides a plan which it is hoped will result in bringing all these institutions into one system under Federal charters and under strict control of law, with ample power of supervision and regulation placed in the Federal Reserve Board.

They are not permitted to operate upon a capital of less than $2,000,000, which can not be impaired by the payment of dividends or otherwise. They are not permitted to organize except with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board. They are subject to examination in practically the same manner as national banks. They are prohibited from controlling or attempting to control prices or form combinations to restrain trade. They are not allowed to receive deposits except such as are incidental to the general purpose for which they are established. In fact, severe penalties are provided to prevent the possibility of any and all of the wrongs and abuses of which we have just heard so much.

If it may be contended that any of the institutions already established embody the possibility of danger to the stability or safety of our financial affairs, as insisted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING], it is only a greater reason why the act before us should be passed. The passage of this act will tend to bring all these institutions into the one system around which we are throwing more thorough safeguards and restrictions. For my own part, I fail to see anything in these other institutions to create alarm. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] seems frightened by the Webb bill and seems to base his opposition to the present bill on his fears of the other measure. Yet the Webb bill has already been enacted into law and is in operation to-day. A number of institutions have been organized under it in which the banks of the country have taken stock. The Webb bill is in full force already, and if any of the dire things referred to here to-day have resulted from the operation of that law, I have not heard of them. But if such danger exists in that law, they should be dealt with in a logical legislative way to cure them or to repeal the act. I submit that it is not fair argument to assail the bill now under consideration on account of supposed defects in former legislation. The fact is, however, that actual experience shows those defects do not exist.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I prefer not to yield. My time is limited, and I want to say one or to other things before I finish. The truth is, gentlemen, that instead of being designed to offer opportunities for the sort of wildcat transactions that have been mentioned this afternoon by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING], this bill is intended to throw additional and more secure safeguards around this kind of business. It may be that these other corporations that may be organized either by the States or by the Federal Government are not covered by the regulations and restrictions that ought to be provided. If so, it is only another reason why Congress should pass the present bill. If this act is passed it is confidently hoped that these corporations organized under State laws will come into the new system under Federal control, where the safeguards contained in the present law will apply and where the Federal Reserve Board will have the power of examination, regulation, and control. So it will be seen that instead of conferring an enlargement or a careless expansion of the dangerous sort of power referred to, this bill will in the very necessity of things promote stability and operate to restrain the tendencies pictured by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING].

Why, the gentleman seems to fear that the Federal Reserve Board is going to put their approval on all sorts of crooked and corrupt practices and combinations in restraint of trade such as has not been known in this country in recent years. I do not believe it. The people of my section of the country have great confidence in the Federal Reserve Board, and this is true throughout the land. The administration of the Federal reserve act by the Federal Reserve Board has given the producing masses of the South and West the greatest opportunity those sections have ever known, and it is being reflected in an increased production and prosperity that is of great benefit to the entire Nation and the world. The power placed in the Federal Reserve Board under this act will be used to restrain and control these institutions. The power will not be abused. It will be exercised to promote the interest of all sections and all classes and will help to preserve the high place we have attained in the financial affairs of the world. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GREEN of Iowa having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7751) authorizing the sale of inherited and unpartitioned allotments for town-site purposes in the Quapaw Agency, Okla.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. FRANCE and Mr. WALSH of Montana members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Civil Service Commission.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. FRANCE and Mr. WALSH of Montana members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Interior Department.

AMENDING THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as there are only 34 gentlemen on the floor, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-eight gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. PLATT. I move that the committee do now rise, and on that motion I ask for tellers.

Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order against that. It is out of order. You can not ask tellers on a roll call.

Mr. PLATT. I make the motion, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that right.

Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order that the Chair, having stated that there was no quorum, the only thing on earth he can do is to have a roll call.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the committee can rise whether there is a quorum present or not. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PLATT and Mr. PHELAN took their places as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 5, noes 57.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 5 and the noes 57, and the committee refuses to rise. A quorum not being present, the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration Senate bill 2472, and finding itself without a quorum he had directed the roll to be called, whereupon 202 Members answered to their names—a quorum—and he presented a list of the absentees to be recorded in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The list of absentees will be recorded in the Journal.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not make it. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. BLANTON. There are only a few Members in the House.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

Thereupon the committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2472, which the Clerk will report by title.

A bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from New York a question. I understand that this bill, in the opinion of those who have studied it carefully, would be of very great value in financing our exports, and particularly financing exports like cotton, of which we have a great surplus. Is that the opinion of the gentleman?

Mr. PLATT. That is true.

Mr. MONDELL. That being true, how does it happen that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], coming from a great cotton State, is conducting a filibuster against the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Was the gentleman from Wyoming speaking in the time of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MONDELL. I was. I wondered why the gentleman from Louisiana was conducting a filibuster against a bill which would be of such great value to the cotton planters of the South.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. KING. It is probably because he sees the danger of this bill to the cotton planter.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, in justice to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] I think he ought to be present before the gentleman propounds a question to him. He is not here. I think the gentleman from Wyoming should wait until he comes here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is not recognized and is out of order. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT]. Does the gentleman from New York yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] 45 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I will yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HERSMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield a moment to me?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will yield for a very brief question or statement. I yield half a minute to the gentleman.

Mr. HERSMAN. Mr. Chairman, California has never disappointed her admirers. She has always taken her place in the forefront of every progressive movement.

On Saturday, at a specially called session of the legislature, by a unanimous vote of the senate and by a vote in the assembly of 73 to 2 the State ratified the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

California is the eighteenth State to ratify the suffrage amendment. The National Woman's Party has reached the half-way post. Their work is all but accomplished. Success can never be in doubt when justice and determination work together. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have been very much interested in this bill because of its effect on the immediate situation, to wit, the matter of the demoralization of foreign exchanges and its effect on our exports, and especially the exports of cotton and of wheat. But of that I spoke briefly on the rule on Saturday. I have been much concerned about the necessity for this measure for the purpose of organizing and maintaining our place in the world's trade with all the solvent nations of the world after we shall have resumed the ordinary conditions of trade.

This morning I was considerably surprised at the discussion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING], in which he arraigned the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, a majority of them of the best Republicans that are over there, and in which he arraigned the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House, all of whom favor the bill except himself, 13 of whom are Republicans and 12 of them favoring the bill, as being ready to deliver this country bound hand and foot into the hands of Plutus, who never appeared before the committee, so far as the hearings show, and into the hands of Crœsus, with whom the committee has not even a speaking acquaintance. [Laughter and applause.]

I was really surprised also that the main burden of the speech of the gentleman was that it was a combination with another iniquity, to wit, the Webb Act, passed by this Congress in 1917 for the purpose of helping the export business of this country, and the fact that the Webb Act took one-third of his time in announcing its iniquities and enormities. And then I went out here and looked to see when the Webb Act was passed and who voted for it, and I found that on June 13, 1917, the Webb Act was passed by a vote of 242 yeas against 29 nays, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] was one of the fellows who voted to pass it. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, if his judgment was so at fault two years ago as to vote to pass that which he has stated here to-day was an enormity that will deliver the people of America, bound hand and foot, into the hands of Plutus and Crœsus and the money power of Wall Street, I do not think we can afford to follow his judgment when it comes to voting on this bill, because his hindsight has been very much better than his foresight, if he is correct to-day. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, gentlemen, this bill, as I said, is designed, first, to help to reestablish normal exchange conditions in the United States. It is designed, secondly, to help establish institutions which will result in the trade of this country being stimulated and preserved and built up in all of the great solvent countries of the world when we resume ordinary national relations. I have stated already the immediate effect on foreign exchange. But before I go on with that I want to direct attention to another thing, and that is that the very thing that would be done under these charters to be granted under this act is now being done under State charters. And what is the difference? The difference is this, that those State charters are as broad as the earth, that they have no restrictions which the Government of the United States can enforce; that they can do all the things that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] speaks of, and this Government has no redress, because it can not forfeit their charters or go in and wind up the corporation. This is a provision for the organizing of institutions to do that same business, restricted in every particular and against every objection made by the gentleman from Illinois, as you will see when we come to read the bill under the five-minute rule, as to the objections which he makes.

Now, let us look at the situation a minute. I have heard a good deal of objection on the outside that this would be a measure which would result in our loaning great sums of money to Europe, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] says this is a bureaucratic bill for the purpose of going into this foreign trade. Let us look at it a minute. The bureau to which he refers is the Federal Reserve Board. To-day the Finance Corporation of the United States, with the governor of the Federal Reserve Board as the presiding genius of that corporation, has the right, under authority granted by legislation in which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] participated, to invest a billion dollars of the money of the United States in this very business for the purpose of encouraging and advancing exports. Now, we do not want him to do that, because that means more taxation, more bonds, and more debts for the United States. Consequently, we want to provide so that the National Government may have, subject to its control, subject to its limitations and under its backing, an institution which will enable this country to do business with all the world under the present condition and to encourage our exports, which are the life of our trade and the foundation of our national prosperity.

They talk about our dealing with Europe. Let us look at that for a minute. The exports of the United States now largely go to Europe—and why? They go to Europe because England and Germany and France have always financed the exports of their own merchants, and they have gone to South America; and when the importer in the Argentine or in Brazil wants goods, does he come to us? No. We sell our cotton to England, and she manufactures it and sells the manufactured product to Brazil and Argentina and Venezuela and to South Africa and to India and to China and Japan. Why? Because they have their arrangements so that the importer in those countries can get six months' time on his purchase, while no banking institutions in this country have the right to loan on those bills for more than 90 days. Now, what is it proposed that we shall do? An importer in the Argentine wants a cargo of cotton goods. He comes to the representative of the cotton manufacturers of New England and says, "I want your goods, but I want them on six months' time. The Government of my country will say to you that my credit is good. I will accept on six months' time and take a cargo of your goods." Can we handle that now? No; except through these State institutions that are working in a limited way; but with the institutions that we propose to create we can handle that exporter. Suppose we have a bill of $100,000 accepted at six months by this importer in the Argentine, and he is certified to be worth $1,000,000 and it is absolutely good. If I ship the goods, can I not get the money for the six months? If you go to one of your great banks you can not do it, because 90 days is the limit.

But take it to one of these great export banks, and the bank will discount the acceptance at six months and carry it. The goods go to South America and the merchant there gets in touch with our export business, and he comes back and trades with us year after year, as long as he can get the accommodations he needs, and it is all to the good of America. Why do I say so? Because if that is not done the English manufacturer will step in. He will have it financed in that way. He will sell the goods, and you establish a triangle whereby we ship the raw cotton from Norfolk to Liverpool, and they manufacture it and ship the manufactured product to the Argentine. They get a cargo of the products of Argentina that we need to bring to New York to be sold here. They make two profits. We have lost a profit and lost the trade by not being prepared to carry it on. That is to be the great foundation stone of our national prosperity, the power to do business with the waiting peoples in Argentina, in Brazil, in Chile, in Venezuela, in South Africa, in India, in every port of the world where the commerce of the United States can be carried by the great mercantile fleet that we are building up, and that I hope to see on every sea, in every port where there is trade to be obtained for the manufacturer and the farmer and the producer of every kind in the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a great deal of objection has been made to this measure on the ground that we say they must be "principally" engaged in this business. Well, now, let us see what they can be principally engaged in. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] said that there could be a combination, that these corporations could become stockholders in the corporations organized under the Webb Act, and that a great combination could be made. Let us see what kind of a corporation they can participate in. They must have the consent of the Federal Reserve Board before they can buy a dollar's worth of stock in any corporation, and then they can only buy stock in a corporation—engaged principally in the business of banking or in any other financial operation of the kinds authorized by this section, but not transacting business in the United States.

Now, how could the gentleman see a ghost in that? They can not acquire stock in any corporation except other corporations not substantial competitors of them, and it must be a corporation that is engaged in the same kind of business and not engaged in business in the United States. Now, no law of the United States reaches beyond the 3-mile limit. Therefore that is not giving any additional power of combination beyond the power already possessed by every corporation in the United States; because, if you go over to Cuba, a corporation in the United States can combine all it wants to over there.

But we did not stop there. On the next page we find the following:

No corporation organized under this section shall carry on any part of its business in the United States except such as, in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board, shall be incidental to its international or foreign business.

Now, what do we mean by that? A corporation has one of these branches in Liverpool. A cotton merchant wants to buy cotton in the United States. He goes to the bank in Liverpool, deposits his money, leaves it there, and comes over and draws a draft for £10,000. He gets only $41,500 instead of $46,800 if he could bring the gold here or had the money in New York. That party could go to the branch in Liverpool or the institution in New York and borrow the money on the same collateral, borrow it and place it in the banks in New York and get $48,500. That would be a deposit incidental to the business carried on, and that is what they mean by that. When he did that he could check that money out, in paying for cotton, and instead of getting only $41,500 on a £10,000 credit he would get $48,600 worth of cotton, and if he paid it out for cotton he could pay 6 cents a pound more for it than he could on the basis of exchange to-day. That is an illustration of what we mean by the business being only incidental.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. The gentleman a moment ago made the statement that I would like to ask two questions about. One is, do these banking corporations receive deposits; is that the intention?

Mr. STEVENSON. Not to receive deposits in the United States except where they are incidental to the business that I have already illustrated.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Does not the gentleman think that it would be a drain upon the finances of the United States if he put in action the method he has just stated?

Mr. STEVENSON. If it is a drain on the United States and its finances to fix it so that the manufacturer and the farmer of the United States of America can sell their goods in every market of the world, and sell them for the highest price—compete with those who have driven us off the seas and out of the markets of the world, making our ships hang up rotting at the wharves—it is a new law of trade to me. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. Regarding the deposits, according to the act these financial corporations are not allowed to receive deposits from citizens of the United States or do a general banking business. They can issue debentures, bonds, and borrow money to the extent of ten times their capital stock and surplus provided it has the approval of the Federal Board. Now, if banking corporation stockholders are liable for double the amount of their stock holdings——

Mr. STEVENSON. My time is limited, and I wish the gentleman would come to his question as soon as possible.

Mr. DUNBAR. Why do you limit the amount of the liability in this act to their subscription for stock?

Mr. STEVENSON. I am glad that the gentleman asked that question. It will come up under the five-minute rule, but I will say that we prohibit their receiving local deposits. The double-liability provision that is in all of the banking laws is expressly to protect the innocent depositor who places his money there because it is a bank. It has the word "bank" written over it, and he thinks it is a good place to put his money, and usually it is. The bank is trustee and the officers are trustees for the depositors. The Government has always said that when you invite citizens of the United States to put their money in the bank, exercising the highest degree of good faith, you must be prepared to protect them to the extent of double what you put in it.

Mr. MADDEN. And there may be deposits to the extent of thirty times the amount of the capital, which is three times more than the amount allowed here for the issue of debentures, bonds, and so forth.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. When it comes to the notes, debentures, and bonds, that is the time when Plutus will show up and Cræsus may figure on these things, and when they do they can take care of themselves. They will look into the solvency of the institution before they buy the investment. They are on notice that they are making investments. They are not in the class where little Mary and Susan and Jane who work in somebody's kitchen put their little bit in the bank until they can save enough for a wedding dress. These men who buy these debentures and bonds and notes are able to take care of themselves, according to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. Is it not a fact that the Federal bank directors are held in such confidence and esteem by the people of the United States that when this proposed financial corporation announces that they have bonds to sell to ten times the extent of their capital stock and surplus—is it not a fact that the confidence of the people in these institutions will invite small investments?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. STEVENSON. In reply to the gentleman from Indiana, it is true that the Federal Reserve Board is held in high esteem, and that these things can not be put out beyond what they propose. They are holding those engaged in business to six times the capital stock, and that is the guardianship that is over the rich investor who buys these bonds, and the guardianship of the stock is sufficient to give that solvency to the corporation.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a single question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, they can not issue any of these debentures without having the collateral behind them on which to base the issue?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; they have to put up the collateral, and that collateral is pledged, and the man who buys the debentures knows what the collateral is.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I can not yield. He knows what the risks are, and he has the money to risk, and he buys it because he expects to make money by the transaction, and he is not, therefore, entitled to any more protection than a man who loans another a thousand dollars on his note with a neighbor as indorser. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is not on the floor. I was called out of the Chamber a moment ago, and in my absence he put into the RECORD a question purporting to ask why I am filibustering against this bill that means something to the cotton farmers of the South. I am not filibustering against this bill. I am for this bill, and no person in this House or in this world knows better than the gentleman from Wyoming what has developed the situation. I have taken as little time on the floor of this House as any gentleman who is a Member of this House.

A week ago I went to the gentleman from Wyoming and asked his permission—bowing, as I did, to the autocratic rule established by him that each ordinary Member must go and get on his knees and beg his permission—I went and asked permission to speak for 35 minutes. He knew I wanted to reveal the rotten leadership of the Republican Party in this House, and he notified me personally that I could not speak on that subject. He knew also that the election occurs in Massachusetts to-morrow, and I was to expose the partisanship manifested by that examining committee against the Democratic candidate in Massachusetts. He refused to let me speak, and I notified him then and there that he would gain time by permitting me to speak even for only 35 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand that the words just spoken by the gentleman be taken down.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that unless those words are a reflection either upon the gentleman from Wyoming or upon the House it would be improper to have them taken down, and I submit they are no reflection——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand that they be taken down under the rule.

Mr. BLANTON. Either upon the gentleman from Wyoming or on the House.

Mr. MONDELL. I shall call the attention of the House to the fact that those words are not the truth.

Mr. ASWELL. Did I not go to your side and ask permission to speak, and did you not say that I could not speak except by unanimous consent?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say at the present time——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired. Does the gentleman insist on having the words reported?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I ask that the words of the gentleman from Wyoming be taken down wherein he said——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is out of order and will be seated.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask the privilege of asking that the words be taken down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman from Wyoming this question, to which he will please respond. Does the gentleman from Wyoming still desire that the words of the gentleman from Louisiana be taken down and reported?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing intervening at this time. Until this business before the House is disposed of the Chair will recognize no one. Subsequently we will take up the other matter.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. In reference to words spoken which a Member has the right to ask be taken down, is it not in order at that time to ask that they be taken down?

The CHAIRMAN. It is; and it will be in order as soon as this is disposed of, but you can not pile one on top of the other.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, a further point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUBEY. After those words are reported, will it then be too late to ask that the words of the gentleman from Wyoming be taken down?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not. The Clerk will report to the committee the words as taken down.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ASWELL. A week ago I went to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and asked his permission, bowing, as I did, to the autocratic rule established by him, that each ordinary Member must go and get on his knees and beg his permission—I went and asked him to speak for 35 minutes. He knew I wanted to reveal the rotten leadership of the Republican Party in this House, and he notified me personally that I could not speak on that subject. He knew also that the election occurs in Massachusetts to-morrow and I was to expose the partisanship manifested by that examining committee against the Democratic candidate in Massachusetts. He refused to let me speak, and I notified him then and there that he would gain time by permitting me to speak even for only 35 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The words under the rule are to be reported to the House for its consideration. The Chair calls to the chair as Speaker pro tempore the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. To what particular language does the gentleman object?

Mr. MONDELL. I object to the language which states that the gentleman spoke to me about the subject that he proposed to discuss; that states I knew the subject he proposed to discuss; and affirms I had knowledge of the subject he proposed to discuss and that I objected to his addressing the House because of that fact.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a single question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill H. R. 2472, in an address delivered to the Chair by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] made the point of order that the words spoken were out of order. Thereupon the Chair ordered that the words should be reported and the words have been reported to the committee and are now reported to the House for such action as the House may deem proper to take under the circumstances.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Mr. Speaker, this is an important matter, and I think we ought to have a quorum to hear about it, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] A quorum of the House is not present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, there not being a quorum present, I move the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There has been no announcement that there was not a quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the Speaker if there is a quorum present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms was directed to notify absent Members, and the Chair has made no announcement of the result.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Can the gentleman from Texas interrupt the roll call?

Mr. KNUTSON. He can not.

Mr. BURKE. Let him take his seat, then.

Mr. BLANTON. In that connection is it not in order to move that the House adjourn at any time?

Mr. BURKE. Sit down.

Mr. BLANTON. You sit down, yourself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ascertain whether or not there is a quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas will take his seat.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not in order for a Member of this House at any time to move for the House to adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not until the roll call is completed and it is ascertained whether there is a quorum present or not.

Mr. BLANTON. I wish to be protected from the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota, who is butting in all the time.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Chair permit me to make a suggestion? Until the vote is announced by the Speaker nothing is in order.

Mr. CRISP. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I beg leave to differ with my distinguished friend, the ex-Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not until the roll call is completed.

Mr. CRISP. I insist that I have a right to be heard on the point of order. Under the rules of the House, which you adopted for your procedure, if there is no quorum present there is but one of two things you can do, adjourn or take steps to get a quorum, and it is always in order to adjourn when no quorum is present. Mr. Speaker, the Speaker can not stand there and refuse to announce whether or not a quorum is present and keep this House indefinitely in session. The House has a right to vote whether or not it will adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct in his statement of the rule, but his position as applied to the present premises is not well taken. The Clerk has not yet handed the Chair the report of the roll call. The Chair was waiting for the tally clerks to complete their count. Therefore, the point of order of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] is premature. On this roll call 207 gentlemen have answered to their names, not a quorum.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and there were—yeas 98, nays 114, answered "present" 8, not voting 212, as follows:

Mr. COPLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman present?

Mr. COPLEY. I do not know whether I was. The gongs had not rung over in the House Office Building, and I was told that a vote was being taken while on the way over here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will record the gentleman as present.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this vote the yeas are 98, the nays are 115, answered "present" 7. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. KITCHIN. How many are present, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Seven answered "present." The nays have it, and the motion to adjourn is not agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend a moment. The Chair is informed by the clerks that in their haste in making the computations there may have been some error. The Chair will recall the announcement just made and give the clerks time to cast up.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, can I change my vote at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The roll call is not yet completed. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. I wish to change from "no" to "aye."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I wish to vote "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana will be recorded as "present." On this vote the yeas are 99, the nays are 114, answered "present" 8. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The nays have it, and the motion to adjourn is not agreed to. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago, in my temporary absence from the Chamber, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] took the floor. On my return to the Chamber he was still talking. I asked that his words be taken down. The words that I asked to be taken down were as follows:

A week ago I went to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and asked his permission, bowing as I did to the autocratic rule established by him, that each ordinary Member must go and get on his knees and beg his permission—I went and asked him to speak for 35 minutes. He knew I wanted to reveal the rotten leadership of the Republican Party in this House, and he notified me personally that I could not speak on that subject. He knew also that the election occurs in Massachusetts to-morrow, and I was to expose the partisanship manifested by that examining committee against the Democratic candidate in Massachusetts. He refused to let me speak, and I notified him then and there that he would gain time by permitting me to speak even for only 35 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I move to strike those words from the RECORD, and for the following reasons: The facts are these: A week ago to-day——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has no right to state facts connected with his motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to strike out the words that I just read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the regular course the Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MONDELL moves to strike from the RECORD the following language:

"A week ago I went to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and asked his permission, bowing as I did to the autocratic rule, established by him, that each ordinary Member must go and get on his knees and beg his permission—I went and asked him to speak for 35 minutes. He knew I wanted to reveal the rotten leadership of the Republican Party in this House, and he notified me personally that I could not speak on that subject. He knew also that the election occurs in Masachusetts to-morrow, and I was to expose the partisanship manifested by that examining committee against the Democratic candidate in Massachusetts. He refused to let me speak, and I notified him then and there that he would gain time by permitting me to speak even for only 35 minutes."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the facts in regard to this matter are as follows——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, is a motion to strike out debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands. Has the gentleman any authority to the contrary?

Mr. KITCHIN. My understanding is that it is not debatable.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that there is no such motion pending.

Mr. KITCHIN. To strike words from the RECORD; that is the motion there. He moves to strike those words from the RECORD. That is the very motion.

Mr. CRISP. If the Speaker will permit, I will read section 4 of Rule XIV.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield or does the gentleman from Georgia make the point of order?

Mr. CRISP. I make the point of order, then, that it is not debatable, and in support of that I read section 4 of Rule XIV.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CRISP. This is section 4 of Rule XIV:

If any Member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any Member may, call him to order, in which case he shall immediately sit down, unless permitted, on motion of another Member, to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case without debate. If the decision is in favor of the Member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed, but not otherwise.

Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is not reading the rule in regard to striking out at all. He is reading another rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that he read section 5, the section immediately following.

Mr. CRISP. I will be delighted to do so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Sit down!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BLANTON. Who was telling me to sit down? Nobody but the Chair will tell me to sit down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order.

Mr. CRISP. Section 5 of Rule XIV reads as follows:

If a Member is called to order for words spoken in debate, the Member calling him to order shall indicate the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's desk and read aloud to the House; but he shall not be held to answer, nor be subject to the censure of the House therefor, if further debate or other business has intervened.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that gives him the right to debate, but on this proposition I submit that even if it is debatable the Chair must first decide whether the words constitute a breach of the rules of debate. Now, if the Chair decides that the words excepted to and taken down constitute a breach of the etiquette of the House and are unparliamentary, then the question is before the House as to what disposition the House will make of them. It seems to me under the rule read the motion is not debatable, but certainly it is not debatable by the gentleman from Wyoming or myself or anyone else until the Chair has first decided whether those words constitute a breach of the privileges of the House and are unparliamentary.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a motion to strike out has been debated in the House within a week.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was going to call the attention of the House to that precedent. The Chair will hear the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. The word "debate" in section 5 of Rule XIV has no reference at all to this question; that is, whether the motion may be debated or not. That rule simply means that after a gentleman utters the offensive words, if a demand is not then made that the words be taken down, and if there is other debate or other business transacted, then you can not take down the words or censure the Member. That is what is meant by the words—

if further debate or other business has intervened—and not what the Chair considers the words to mean.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a motion to strike out has been debated within a week.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has that very precedent in mind, that within a week a motion of exactly the same kind has been made and debated in the House.

Mr. WINGO. Will the Chair permit this——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. I think this question arose once when Speaker CLARK was Speaker, and, as I recall, he ruled that you had to vote upon the motion at once. I make this suggestion to the Speaker, that if you hold that a motion to strike out words taken down in debate is debatable, then you open the floodgate for filibustering. Then if anything in the nature of partisan criticism is uttered in debate, a gentleman desiring to filibuster can demand in committee that the words be taken down. He can force the committee to rise, and then if, under the rules of the House, a motion to strike out the words is debatable, he can speak for one hour, and by repeated demands support at length a filibuster. It is true in some instances that the House has permitted debate without the point being made. It did it the other day, although I expected, as other gentlemen did, that the point of order would be made and debate shut off. I suggest to the Chair, as well as to the majority leader, that he is opening the door to possible trouble in the future.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Wyoming on the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have not recently looked up the precedents, but I do know, as the gentleman from Arkansas admits, that it has been the practice of the House to debate a motion to strike out words uttered in debate. The only argument made by the gentleman from Arkansas is that it is a questionable practice. That may be. I grant you that if we spend a large part of our time on debate of that sort it would interfere with business. But I assume that gentlemen do not lightly demand that words spoken in debate shall be taken down, and the cases where that is done are very infrequent, and where demand was made, as far as I can recall, debate has been had.

Mr. Speaker, there is no way under heaven whereby the House can intelligently pass upon a case of this sort unless there is some opportunity for debate.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. With the courtesy of the gentleman from Wyoming yielding, I would like to present this thought to the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CRISP. What brings this matter before the Chair? Under what basis is the motion made to strike out? On the ground that it is unparliamentary. That is the only way the conduct of the gentleman from Louisiana is called in question at the bar of the House, because the mover of the motion to strike out says that he uttered words that were unparliamentary. It is not just or fair to the gentleman from Louisiana to have him up here with a motion to strike out his words unless he has violated some of the rules of the House. Therefore it seems to me that before the matter can be open for discussion, even if it is debatable, the Chair must decide whether the language is unparliamentary.

I grant you, Mr. Speaker, that there might be some debate on the question as to whether or not the words excepted to constitute a breach; but certainly, Mr. Speaker, there can not be any debate as to whether you will strike them out or any reason that led up to this controversy or any other question, save that one proposition, whether the words used in the Committee of the Whole by the gentleman from Louisiana are unparliamentary, and that is the motion pending before the Speaker. It seems to me that undoubtedly the Chair must decide that before you can proceed further with the motion to strike out the words.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair desires to be fortified in the matter, I am perfectly willing to say that the language used is, in my opinion, unparliamentary, if my opinion in the matter has any effect on the situation. I was about to explain why it was unparliamentary when I was interrupted by gentlemen on the other side, but evidently they do not want the truth.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the words of the gentleman from Wyoming be taken down.

Mr. BLANTON. I demand that the words of the gentleman from Wyoming be taken down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman from Georgia make a request?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand that the words of the gentleman be taken down.

Mr. CRISP. I beg the Chair's pardon—did the Chair ask me a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman from Georgia make a request?

Mr. CRISP. I moved to take down the words of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to this effect, that gentlemen "on the other side" did not want the truth to appear.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman ought at least to quote me correctly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, under the rules, debate must cease, and the gentleman from Wyoming must take his seat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming will suspend. The gentleman from Georgia has asked that the words of the gentleman from Wyoming be taken down. The Clerk will report the words.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman——

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wyoming, under the circumstances, must, under the rules of the House, take his seat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming will suspend. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. BANKHEAD. To submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There being two motions pending to take down words, which takes priority of consideration under the rules?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I intend to withdraw my request to take down the words, and I do so. I simply made the request to show the gentleman from Wyoming how absurd and ridiculous his motion is to strike out the words of the gentleman from Louisiana, which are in effect the same as his words.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request, that the words of the gentleman be taken down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not at this time have the words taken down as the request has been withdrawn by another gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Immediately upon the use of the words by the gentleman from Wyoming I rose and asked that they be taken down, and I renew that request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia had meanwhile made a request and had debated it, so that the gentleman from Texas is too late.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the Chair rule that only the gentleman from Georgia has the right to make such a request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia did make the request, and he made it ahead of the gentleman from Texas and was recognized. The matter was considered and withdrawn by him. In the opinion of the Chair, it now comes too late for the gentleman from Texas to make his demand.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the Chair holds that nobody else can make that demand?

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman from Texas will not insist upon having the words taken down——

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to have the Chair rule correctly.

Mr. GARRETT. But I respectfully dissent from the ruling of the Chair, because if some gentleman makes the point and then withdraws it, certainly the Chair would not hold that another Member could not renew the point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's contention would be correct in the case of a point of order, that any Member could make the point of order, but it seems to the Chair that if he permitted one Member after another to make such a demand it could go on indefinitely. It is a matter for the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman's words be taken down, and I ask the Chair to rule whether or not I am in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair rules that the gentleman is not in order at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay that appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the gentleman's appeal do lie on the table. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas demands a division.

The House divided, and the Chair counted 112 Members in the affirmative.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming that the appeal of the gentleman from Texas from the decision of the Chair do lie on the table. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 96, answered "present" 7, not voting 211, as follows:

Mr. GOOD with Mr. DOOLING.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois with Mr. ROUSE.

Mr. EDMONDS with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, is a quorum present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wyoming rise?

Mr. MONDELL. To submit a request. In order to save the House a further discussion of the point of order, I ask unanimous consent that I may discuss the matter under consideration for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to be permitted to discuss the matter for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have five minutes following.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] have five minutes after the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. CANNON. And that both of them speak to the matter before the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. And remain in order while they are speaking. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, in that case I ask that I may have a minute of my five minutes after the gentleman from Louisiana has spoken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the modification to that extent? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the words that I moved to have stricken out have been read to the House, and by this time are familiar to all of the gentlemen. In his statement the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] said:

He—

Speaking of me—

knew I wanted to reveal the rotten leadership of the Republican Party in the House, and he notified me personally that I could not speak on that subject.

The facts are that on Monday, a week ago to-day, the gentleman from Louisiana, without any previous statement to me whatever, and on being recognized, asked unanimous consent to address the House for 35 minutes on the following Saturday. He was informed that he was not recognized for that purpose. Whereupon, a little later, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] came to my seat and further expressed a desire to speak. He gave no intimation or suggestion of the subject of his address. I told him that I could not at this time of the session agree to a special order for speeches at a specified time, owing to the desire of the House to dispatch the public business before it; but that no doubt abundant opportunity would be given him in the course of debate. There has been debate to-day, controlled on his side, which could have been yielded to him, and in which time he could have discussed the matter that he desires to discuss. In fact the statement he made to which I object was made in time so yielded him. That is the only conversation I have ever had with the gentleman from Louisiana on the subject of his speech. I had not the slightest idea of the subject of his speech. I knew nothing about it; had no intimation of its character, when I objected this morning, because there was a matter of great importance before the House. And the gentleman was not justified in impugning my motives as he did.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, on the 20th of October I introduced a series of resolutions in this House calling upon the various investigating committees to report money and time expended to date. At that time I gave out an interview, which was carried in practically every newspaper of the country, criticizing the Republican leaders of this House, and particularly with regard to failing to do anything for the soldiers, and containing a reference to these investigations. That was carried everywhere. On last Monday I addressed the Speaker. He recognized me. I asked unanimous consent to speak Saturday. The Speaker said that he did not recognize me for that purpose. I immediately went to the Speaker's desk personally and asked what the trouble was, and he said that I had not spoken to him in advance, and then he asked me on what subject. I told him frankly that I proposed to speak on war expenditures and this Congress. He smiled pleasantly and said, "You best see MONDELL." Later on I went to Mr. MONDELL and, I repeat, very humbly, as Members have to do, I asked him if I might not speak. He said, "No." Now, the facts had been carried through the press; they had been told about the House; my purpose had been heralded throughout the country, and I assumed that the majority leader, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], knew. I did not have the slightest doubt from his manner. He should have known and I assumed that he knew.

And now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of this House, the criticisms I have made to-night have been so clearly demonstrated in the last two hours by ocular demonstration to everybody in the House and in the galleries that I have nothing more to say. It is proven by the conduct here of Republican leaders.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming has two minutes remaining.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, no Member of this House has the right to impugn the motives of another Member. I say again that I had no intimation, I had no thought, of the subject of the gentleman's discussion. I said to him, as I have said to all others, that, in my opinion, it was not wise at this time to fix a time at a future date when a gentleman would be entitled to take up time that might be needed for the transaction of the public business. The gentleman from Louisiana might have received time to-day from the other side—time that was available.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Does not the gentleman recall that the time on both sides of the discussion for these two days has been controlled by two gentlemen on his side of the House, Mr. PLATT and Mr. KING?

Mr. MONDELL. No.

Mr. ASWELL. That is true.

Mr. MONDELL. By the arrangement that was finally made one-third of the time was given to that side. The gentleman did get five minutes of that time.

Mr. ASWELL. The debate on the bill——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentlemen in charge of the time may have had their time already apportioned and may have made promises. I do not want to be unfair to them. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman must not say that gentlemen are denied the opportunity to speak because of any objection I have to the subject matter of their speeches. I certainly shall never object to any proper parliamentary address on this floor because I do not approve of the subject matter of a speech. I had no intimation as to the subject the gentleman proposed to discuss. I followed the rule that I have followed heretofore, to which no exception has been made, except in the case of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], who, by reason of his age and his long and honorable Army service and his long, distinguished service in this House, I believed was entitled to that consideration. I treated the gentleman from Louisiana just as I have other gentlemen on both sides. I knew nothing of the character of his proposed speech or what he intended to talk about. With this explanation, I have no objection to the words he uttered remaining in the RECORD. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw his motion?

Mr. MONDELL. I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman withdraws his motion.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order previously made, until Wednesday, November 5, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the president of the United States Civil Service Commission, transmitting certain schedules of useless papers in the files of the commission and requesting that appropriate action be taken to grant permission to destroy same (H. Doc. No. 285); to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Department of Commerce for field expenses of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 286); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a tentative draft of a bill to amend section 4881 of the Revised Statutes, relating to national cemeteries (H. Doc. No. 287); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on survey and flood control of the Atchafalaya River, La., and related basins (H. Doc. No. 288); to the Committee on Flood Control and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SIMS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10208) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near the city of Decatur, Ala., reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 440), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, from the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 362) providing for the distribution and sale of surplus Army motor vehicles, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 441), which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8290) to provide for awarding decorations, devices, or insignia to the next of kin of deceased persons who would have been entitled to receive the same, and making it unlawful for anyone other than the person authorized to do so to wear such decoration, device, or insignia, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 442), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. RHODES: A bill (H. R. 10346) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Farmington, Mo.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HICKS: A bill (H. R. 10347) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the village of Baldwin, in the State of New York, one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 10348) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 10349) authorizing the acquirement of a site and the construction of a building for a post office at Greybull, Wyo.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

STRIKE OF COAL MINERS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a series of resolutions adopted by Boulder Post, No. 10, of the American Legion of Colorado, and as they are very short and very timely I ask that they may be read by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolutions adopted by Boulder Post, No. 10, American Legion, October 30, 1919.

"Whereas the leaders of the bituminous coal miners' union of the United States have announced their intention to declare a nation-wide strike in the coal fields; and

"Whereas the President of the United States, the Attorney General, and the governor of Colorado have all declared such action to be a menace to the welfare of the Nation, and have issued appeals to the miners to continue in their employment and to protect the country in this crisis; and

"Whereas if the leaders of the union persist in their determination to force this strike despite the appeal of the President, the governor of this State, and the overwhelming sentiment of the public, they will be guilty of an act in open defiance of governmental authority, public opinion, and the Nation's welfare: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That Boulder Post, No. 10, American Legion, condemns this threatened closing of all mines as a menace to the interests of the Nation, and pledges itself to aid the National, State, and county authorities by any means in its power in the maintenance of law and order and the upholding of governmental authority; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be furnished the press, the President of the United States, our Senators and Congressmen, the governor of Colorado, the board of county commissioners, and the sheriff of Boulder County.

"FRANK A. KEMP, Jr.,
"Post Commander.
"E. H. MCBRIDE,
"Post Adjutant."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARRISON. I submit a resolution adopted by the State convention of the Mississippi Branch of the American Legion at Jackson, Miss., and I ask that it may be read.

There being no objection, the resolution was read as follows:

VICKSBURG, MISS., October 22, 1919.

Senator PAT HARRISON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The State convention of the Mississippi Branch of the American Legion at Jackson, Miss., yesterday adopted the following resolution:

"Be it resolved by the Mississippi State Convention of the American Legion, That this body recommends that the peace treaty be adopted without reservation, and that copies of this resolution be sent by wire to President Wilson, Senators WILLIAMS, HARRISON, JOHNSON, and LODGE."

ALEXANDER FITZHUGH,
State Chairman.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Is the chairman a Republican?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a protest from Local Union No. 75A, of Clarkdale, Ariz., against the deportation of certain Hindus.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[International Association of Bridge, Structural, and Ornamental Iron Workers. Address of writer: Verde, Ariz.]

LOCAL UNION NO. 75A,
Clarkdale, Ariz., October 23, 1919.

Senator MARK SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

Whereas the United States of America, since it gained its independence from Great Britain in 1776, has extended the principle of political asylum to political refugees from other countries who have fled from the wrath of tyrannical governments; and

Whereas the efforts of certain Hindus to gain freedom for their native land have resulted in a number of these people being compelled to serve prison sentences in this country; and

Whereas some of these men, now held for and threatened with deportation, which will mean death or imprisonment for life, for no other reason than that Britain's economic exploitation and political domination over India may continue so to go unchallenged: Be it

Resolved, That we, Local 75A, Bridge, Structural, and Ornamental Iron Workers, of Clarkdale, Ariz., emphatically protest against the flagrant violation of the spirit of democracy involved in this denial of the right of asylum; against the carrying out of the deportation of Hindus, and in conformity with the principles of self-determination of peoples we demand that the persecution of these Hindus cease; and be it further

Resolved, That our secretary be asked to send copies of this resolution to President Woodrow Wilson; Secretary of Labor William B. Wilson; to Mr. Abercrombie, Department of Immigration at Washington; to Congressmen and Senators from this State; to the daily press; and to the Friends of Freedom for India, 7 East Fifteenth Street, New York City.

CHRIS. J. CARLSEN, President.
JAMES OHD, Secretary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have resolutions adopted by the State convention of the American Legion of the State of Washington with reference to several very important questions. The resolutions purport to represent the sentiment of this large organization in the State, and I think they ought to be printed in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions may be referred to the appropriate committees and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the appropriate committees and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on Immigration:

Be it resolved by the American Legion of the State of Washington, in convention assembled, That we are in favor of legislation continuing in force and operation the present restrictions on immigration as provided in the bill introduced in the House of Representatives of the United States by Representative JOHNSON, of Washington, and now pending therein, or by some other measure involving the same principles; and

Be it further resolved, That we are in favor of the adoption of a law by the Congress of the United States of America which will provide in substance, as follows:

1. That an immigrant to the United States must apply for his passport to the American Consul.

2. That upon arriving in the United States such immigrant shall register at the United States immigration office, and must reregister with such office, or some branch thereof, at least once a year until such time as he shall be admitted to full and complete citizenship according to law.

3. That in the event any immigrant does not comply with the laws of the United States of America, and become a full and complete citizen of this country within a specified number of years, to be provided by law, or in the event any immigrant is unable for any reason to become a citizen of the United States within such period so to be provided, then in either such event, such immigrant or alien who is within the United States at the time such law shall take effect shall be deported to the country from whence he came as an undesirable.

Be it further resolved, That the delegates from the State to the national convention of the American Legion at Minneapolis be instructed to work for the adoption of a resolution similar to this by such national convention.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to members of the Washington delegation in the United States Congress.

To the Committee on Military Affairs:

Whereas it is contemplated by the Congress of the United States to authorize the establishing of additional national cemeteries of various localities; and

Whereas in the opinion of this convention the military reservation at American Lake, Wash., is an ideal and admirable site for such a cemetery and very fitting on account of the large number of soldiers who received their training there: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Legion of the State of Washington, in convention assembled, That we urge upon the Washington delegation in Congress to take all steps within their power to secure the location of a national cemetery on the military reservation at American Lake, Wash.

To the Committee on Finance:

Whereas it has been the policy of the United States Government to pay war-risk insurance policies to beneficiaries in 240 equal payments, the maximum payment on any policy being $57.50 monthly; and

Whereas there is now no form of policy provided to which war-risk insurance can be converted by which the beneficiary can be paid in any manner other than 240 equal monthly payments upon the death of the insured: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Legion of the State of Washington, in convention assembled at Seattle, October 9, 1919, That it be the recorded decision of this legion that adequate provision be made by the United States Congress whereby the insured will be allowed the option of providing in his policy of war-risk insurance the method of payment of the policy to the beneficiary upon the insured's death; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be prepared and forwarded at once to all members of the United States Congress from the State of Washington.

To the Committee on Public Lands:

Whereas numerous bills, each offering some measure of assistance to the soldiers, sailors, and marines veterans of the late war, are now pending in the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas the people of the United States demand the enactment of a law providing substantial recognition of the patriotic service of those who at their country's call put aside all private interests and went forth to wrest our liberties from the grasp of the tyrant foe; and

Whereas the American home is the bulwark of our liberties, and the proposed legislation herein referred to will greatly strengthen the Nation by making possible the addition of perhaps 2,000,000 new home owners; and

Whereas the Morgan bill provides for the organization of a corporation underwritten by the United States Government, authorized to sell bonds and loan the proceeds to veterans of this war for the purchase of homes, either urban or rural; and

Whereas this bill, among other things, provides for a loan on long time, a maximum of 60 years, with a low rate of interest, not to exceed 3½ per cent, and in an amount not to exceed $4,000,000 for the purchase of a home, either urban or rural, these loans to be available to every honorably discharged soldier, sailor, or marine, without security other than that of the property as purchased, the additional security required by good business practice being supplied by the creating of a guaranty fund: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Legion of the State of Washington, in convention assembled—

First. That we indorse and recommend for passage House bill 5545, introduced in the House of Representatives of the United States on June 11, 1919, by the Hon. DICK T. MORGAN, of Oklahoma, and that we do hereby respectfully request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to support this measure.

Second. That a copy of this resolution be embodied in the minutes of the proceedings of this convention, and that a copy hereof be forwarded to each of the United States Senators and Representatives of the State of Washington, and to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the special committee to which proposed legislation in the interests of the veterans of this war has been referred.

Third. That the delegates from this State to the national convention of the American Legion to be held in the city of Minneapolis, Minn., in November, 1919, be instructed to do all in their power to secure the adoption of a similar resolution by said national convention.

To the Committee on Education and Labor:

1. That the vocational rehabilitation act should be liberalized and extended by the repeal of section 13 of said act to include, as eligible for full-time training with full subsistence payments as well as tuition, books, and supplies, all disabled veterans of the World War, regardless of the degree of their disability or without any attempt whatever on the part of any Government agency to define whether or not any man with any particular disability has a so-called "vocational handicap."

2. That in order that the district offices of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, division of rehabilitation, may have adequate facilities and proper arrangements for making prompt payments to the men in training under said board, each district should be granted full power and authority to disburse Government moneys to the disabled veterans in training under the said board, in the amounts and at such time as they may be legally entitled to payments, thus obviating grievous and vexatious delays occasioned by the issuance and transmission of checks from the central office in Washington.

3. That the Federal board be empowered by law to make payments upon whatever scale may be deemed reasonable and proper by Congress to discharged veterans of the World War, while their cases are pending with the board and preceding their actual entry into training.

4. That arrangements be immediately undertaken, and as soon as possible perfected, in districts where hospital facilities are now inadequate for proper and adequate hospitalization of all cases requiring hospital care, but with particular concern for cases suffering from mental disabilities.

5. That the Federal board be empowered by law with full authority to extend to all disabled veterans under their care whatever medical and dental care may be deemed by the medical officers of the board to be in need of while in training under the authority of said board.

6. That the United States Railroad Administration be empowered by law, if the railroads are retained by the United States Government, and if not then the individual owners of the railroads be required by law to sell transportation to any man who establishes his identity as being in training under the Federal Board for Vocational Education, at a rate not exceeding 1 cent per mile for any travel authorized by the Federal Board for Vocational Education.

7. That payments to men in training be increased as follows:

For single men without dependents	$100
For single men with dependents	125

(With allotments for each dependent according to the scale provided by the war-risk insurance act.)

Special attention of the Members of Congress is directed to the provision last above mentioned, after having been given careful consideration by the Veterans' Vocational Club in view of the ever-increasing high cost of living.

To the Committee on Immigration:

Whereas during the late war we have seen many examples of peoples who have obtained citizenship and enjoyed the privileges and prosperity of our country for many years, so conduct themselves that they prove themselves unworthy of citizenship; and

Whereas we, in convention assembled, do recognize the fact that the time has come when the people of this country who have come here from foreign shores must be taught that American citizenship is a thing of inestimable value and not a mere nonentity: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we do recommend to Congress that any person convicted of an offense, the gist of which is one against the ideals and institutions of our country, shall have his citizenship canceled, and that proceedings shall be brought against those who have so conducted themselves as to show any reason of the antagonism against the institutions of our country and denunciation of its principles, and that they, too, shall have their citizenship canceled and shall be deported to the country from whence they came as undesirables.

Mr. BALL. I present resolutions adopted at a special meeting of the Young Men's Republican Club, of Wilmington, Del., held on October 24, 1919, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas statements have appeared in the public press intended to convey the impression that the Members of Congress who are opposing the ratification of the proposed compact for a league of nations are not acting in accordance with the desires of a majority of their constituents; and

Whereas a special meeting of the Young Men's Republican Club, of Wilmington, Del., has been held this 24th day of October, 1919, for the purpose of discussing the position of the above-mentioned Congressmen, and more particularly Hon. L. HEISLER BALL, United States Senator from the State of Delaware; and

Whereas, after a full and free discussion, with an opportunity given to everyone who desired to express an opinion, it is the unanimous sense of this meeting that the proposed compact for a league of nations ought not to be ratified without certain reservations and amendments for the following reasons:

First. It would involve the United States in entangling foreign alliances, contrary to the traditional policy upon which our advancement as a Nation has been largely based, with no justification for such a departure from a tried and proved policy except the false premise that changes in conditions afford a sufficient ground for the abandonment of fundamental principles which never change.

Second. It opens wide the door for intolerable and improper interference for foreign powers with the business and industrial affairs of the United States, and with our tariff and immigration laws and with our policy known as the "Monroe doctrine."

Third. This compact, in its present form, is the product of secret diplomacy, handed to the American people as though it were of divine origin which must be accepted exactly as it is, and must not be touched in any way by our duly elected Senators, constitutionally empowered and directed to do so.

Fourth. However lofty its idealism may be, the proposed compact contains specific provisions antagonistic to its general purpose, and would almost inevitably tend to drag the United States into war and bloodshed. It is assumed that our delegate to the league would vote in accordance with the desires of a majority of our people, but his doing so is not safeguarded in any way.

Fifth. The methods by which the administration is attempting to force this document upon Congress are unfair and violently partisan. The sentimental whining, that if this covenant be amended in the least it will break the heart of the world is abominable claptrap. The argument that we are at war with Germany until the ratification of this covenant is misleading, for this covenant has no connection with a treaty of peace, and for all practical purposes the war between the United States and Germany is now ended. The President has failed to negotiate a treaty of peace, which he had full authority to do, and has wasted valuable time and energy and a great deal of money in a vain attempt to commit the United States as a contracting party to this covenant for a league of nations, which he has not, and never did have, the right to do, even under his extraordinary war powers.

Sixth. Under it we surrender our sovereignty. We allow foreign nations to dictate when we shall declare war or when we shall make peace. Under it we will form a partnership with a host of unscrupulous nations. Under it we will send our boys to police the people of Europe and Asia, murderous by nature, debasers of women, fanatics by religion, and infamous in the scale of civilization: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the unanimous sense of this meeting that the course pursued by the Members of Congress who have supported Senator LODGE in his gallant fight for proper reservations or amendments is to the best interests of all the people of the United States and is in line with their patriotic duty; and be it further

Resolved, That the attitude of Hon. L. HEISLER BALL, United States Senator from Delaware, and CALEB R. LAYTON, Representative in Congress, upon this vital question, has been and is 100 per cent American, and that Senator BALL is entitled to the enthusiastic support and the heartiest commendation of all his constituents for his courageous and statesmanlike stand.

H. H. BILLANY, President.
THOMAS E. PENNEY, Secretary.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I present resolutions adopted by the Lead City Commercial Club, of Lead, S. Dak., condemning the strike of the bituminous coal miners. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas certain elements of organized labor engaged in the coal-mining industry have made certain demands for shorter hours and greatly increased pay, and seek to enforce such demands by a nation-wide strike, the effect of which will be to paralyze all business, means of transportation, and bring untold suffering and misery upon the people of the Nation, and particularly upon the poorer classes; and

Whereas the union workmen who threaten to bring this disaster upon the Nation represent only a small part of the laboring classes of the Nation and a mere fraction of the entire population of the country; and

Whereas the granting of these unjust demands will result in increasing the cost of living to the rest of the public, and placing upon them unjust and greatly increased burdens: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Lead City Commercial Club, of the city of Lead, S. Dak., expresses the overwhelming sentiment of this community in now condemning as unjust and criminal the threatened strike in the coal-mining industry of the Nation, called for November 1, and we denounce the socialistic leaders who are responsible for the calling of this strike; and be it further

Resolved, That we unqualifiedly indorse the attitude of President Wilson in denouncing the aforesaid demands as unlawful and unjust, and we urge our Senators and Representatives in Washington to use all available means and adopt such measures as may be necessary, however drastic, to protect the American people from this threatened outrage.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of Mount Higgin Court, No. 629, Catholic Order of Foresters, of Anaconda, Mont., and a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Speakers' Bureau of the Woman's Republican Club of New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty unless certain reservations are adopted, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAPPER presented a memorial of Midland Grange, No. 1681, Patrons of Husbandry, of Burrton, Kans., remonstrating against universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SUGAR SHORTAGE.

Mr. RANSDELL. I submit the views of the minority of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry upon the bill (S. 3284) to provide for the national welfare by continuing the United States Sugar Equalization Board until December 31, 1920, and for other purposes, which was reported yesterday from that committee by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report (No. 286, pt. 2) will be received and printed.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DIAL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 2756) to prescribe the method of capital punishment in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 287) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 3369) to construct a public building for a post office at the city of Port Angeles, Wash.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SMITH of Georgia:

A bill (S. 3370) fixing the salary of the district attorney for the northern district of Georgia; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KIRBY (by request):

A bill (S. 3371) authorizing Gordon N. Peay, jr., his heirs and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge and approaches thereto across the White River; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HENDERSON:

A bill (S. 3372) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to Jennie Dunphy Meyer for certain lands in the State of Nevada; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A bill (S. 3373) granting a pension to James Martin (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KENYON:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 123) providing for a special commission to deal with the present strike in the bituminous and lignite coal mines of the United States; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

RAVAGES OF EUROPEAN CORN BORER.

Mr. WATSON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the report of Indiana representatives who have investigated the ravages of the European corn borer and made a report. I think it will be of interest, and I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"PURDUE UNIVERSITY
"AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
"Lafayette, Ind., October 24, 1919.

"Senator JAMES E. WATSON,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"DEAR SIR: Some two weeks ago I visited the areas in Massachusetts and New York State which are infested with the European corn borer. This is a European pest imported into this country within recent years. Its work has caused considerable alarm in some quarters, especially in view of the possibility of the spread of the corn borer into the great corn-growing sections of the Middle West. It was with the view to getting first-hand information which could be used in formulating a policy for Indiana on the best procedure to prevent the corn borer from coming into this State that the investigation in question is being made. Inasmuch as large appropriations have been asked in Congress for the corn-borer fight it occurred to me that you might be interested in the attached memorandum which gives my own impressions of the situation.

Very truly, yours,

C. G. WOODBURY, Director.

"OCTOBER, 1919.

"EUROPEAN CORN-BORER INVESTIGATIONS—MASSACHUSETTS AND NEW YORK.

"The fact that the European corn borer had been introduced into the United States has been generally known for a year or more. The severity of its attacks in eastern Massachusetts and New York State were strongly emphasized, however, in the press reports, resolutions, etc., following the conference held the last of August in Albany and Boston by the National Association of Commissioners of Agriculture.

"On September 16 the director of the experiment station wrote the director of the conservation commission, calling attention to newspaper reports of extensive corn-borer damage and to the report of the conference above referred to, and suggested that the station and the conservation commission cooperate in determining what policy might be best for Indiana to pursue under the circumstances. A conference between Mr. Brown, president of the Indiana Farmers' Association, and the director of the conservation commission and the director of the experiment station, followed this suggestion. It was agreed that an investigation ought to be made in the field and a first-hand knowledge gained of the exact situation in the Eastern States, the measures in operation to combat the ravages of the corn borer, the judgment of those in charge of the situation in the East as to possibilities of control or extermination, the probable or possible effectiveness of quarantine measures, etc. It was felt that a representative of the Federation of Farmers' Associations should also make the trip in order to supplement the judgment of the representatives of the experiment station and the conservation commission.

"The director of the station had been in correspondence with the Federal Horticultural Board in the meantime, and a meeting had been arranged between the Indiana representatives and the Federal Horticultural Board to be held in Boston, Friday, October 3.

"Personnel: The members of the Indiana party were as follows: Frank N. Wallace, entomologist, representing the Conservation Commission; L. M. Vogler, representing the Federation of Farmers' Associations; W. H. Larrimer, Federal entomologist stationed at La Fayette; C. G. Woodbury, director, representing the agricultural experiment station.

"At Boston we were joined by Dr. C. L. Marlatt, chairman of the Federal Horticultural Board, Washington, D. C.; Dr. Karl F. Kellerman, Associate Chief Bureau of Plant Industry, Washington, D. C., member of the Federal Horticultural Board; and George B. Sudworth, member of the Federal Horticultural Board. Dr. E. P. Felt, State entomologist of New York State, also joined the party at Boston. The local inspection was under the guidance of Mr. L. H. Worthley, in charge of the corn-borer control work in Massachusetts, and Mr. D. J. Caffrey, entomologist in charge of the Arlington corn-borer laboratory.

"In New York State the Indiana representatives and members of the Federal Horticultural Board were accompanied in the field by Dr. Felt, by Mr. Atwood, in charge of nursery inspection, under whose direction some corn-borer work in New York State has been done, and by Mr. Van Buren, who has had charge of field work in connection with corn-borer clean-up work undertaken by New York State.

"Itinerary: As stated above, the party was organized in Boston on Friday morning, October 30. Transportation was provided through the courtesy of Mr. Worthley's office, and the party spent most of the day in an automobile trip through as much of the infested territory north and west of Boston as could be covered.

"The members of the Federal Horticultural Board and the Indiana representatives left Boston Friday night and arrived at Albany Saturday morning. At Albany a conference was held with Mr. C. S. Wilson, New York State commissioner of agriculture, and the balance of the day was spent in a field trip inspecting as many of the infested fields as could be visited in the area about Schenectady. The party separated at Albany Saturday night.

"Conditions in Massachusetts: In Massachusetts the corn borer has two broods during the season and in a part of the infested territory at least is very thoroughly established, being found on smartweed, ragweed, lamb's-quarter, barnyard grass, cocklebur, and other weeds and grasses, as well as on sweet corn, flint corn, and rarely on silage or fodder corn, such as Eureka.

"Many new and interesting items of information about the habits of the insect were brought out during the course of the day's field trip. It has been established, for instance, that the insect may also occur and in the Massachusetts area is found infesting such garden flowers as salvia, peony, gladiolus, and dahlia. It has been found in pepper, in beets in the field, and is not uncommon in celery. From the economic standpoint it was appparent that the most damage was being done to sweet corn. The worst infested patches of sweet corn were seriously injured by the presence of the borers in the cob and the corn. In the worst infested patches of field corn, on the other hand, there were many sound ears even on stalks containing borers. Probably considerably less than half of the ears were infested in the worst infested patches of field corn. Much clean-up work has been done at State and Federal expense in this territory. The effectiveness of such work is questionable. There are fields which were not cleaned up last year but which nevertheless have a much smaller infestation of borers this year than last. On the other hand, there are fields in which as high as $75 per acre was expended in clean-up work in which the borers apparently are more severe this year than they were last. It seemed rather evident that the worst infestations were in fields surrounded by neglected and waste ground overgrown with weeds or bounded by abandoned war gardens grown up to weeds and old garden plants, corn, etc. One rather notable example of clean-up work was inspected on the Brooks estate, near Boston. The manager of this estate was instructed by the owner to do everything possible to rid the corn of the borer. Here methods of good, clean farming were followed; there were few weeds and no waste ground immediately about the cornfield, a rather close-clipped meadow came right up to the corn rows, and although the labor cost in the clean-up work which has been done was probably greater than the average farmer would feel able to afford, nevertheless the work appeared to have resulted in diminishing the amount of infestation in a marked degree. The evidence of some other fields, however, where clean-up work apparently did not have this effect, must raise the question whether in such cases as the Brooks estate the results accomplished were due actually to the work done or to some operation of natural causes.

"There was a very interesting exhibit at the Medford experimental plats. Various varieties of corn had been grown on these plats, including different types of sweet corn, flint corn, and Eureka, a late southern dent corn. There was considerable infestation in nearly all of the varieties with the exception of the Eureka. This variety was still standing, the planting consisting of a single row through the plat, the early-maturing varieties of corn on either side of which had been harvested. Apparently there had been every opportunity for an equal infestation of the Eureka corn, yet it was difficult to find traces of a borer in this standing row. This would seem to offer interesting evidence or at least support the suggestion that our Indiana varieties of corn, which are much larger, stronger growing, and with heavier stalks than the sweet corn and flint corn grown in Massachusetts, might have a considerable degree of natural immunity to borer attack.

"Dr. Felt is inclined to place a different interpretation upon the apparent immunity of the Eureka corn in the Medford plats, his contention being that the susceptibility of the varieties depends in a large measure on its state of maturity, tassel formation, etc., at the time the moths are in flight and laying eggs, rather than on any inherent difference in the susceptibility of the variety to borer attacks.

"Some means of attempted control proved by Massachusetts State officials early in the borer fight have proved quite worthless. The party visited one field of probably 10 or 12 acres of sweet corn, which early in the season had been condemned by Massachusetts officials and ordered plowed up. The order had been complied with and sweet corn had been replanted late and had just matured its crop. Apparently the crop had been harvested, although it was not difficult to find a few ears remaining. Some of these ears were infested by the borer, but we were given to understand that the late-planted crop had nevertheless been quite profitable. It was apparent that the plowing up of the corn in the spring had not afforded protection from the borer. It has been shown that the borers may be buried 8 inches deep and yet pupate, and the moths emerge apparently without difficulty. The practice of attempting to control the borer by plowing under infested stubble or weeds is, then, entirely futile.

"It has been shown also that the borer may feed on lawn grass and come to maturity without having access to corn plants or the common weeds which it ordinarily infests.

"Conditions in New York State: In New York State the principal infested territory is in the vicinity of Schenectady. The insect appears to be confined mostly to corn in this district. Infested cornfields have been found scattered about an area of 400 square miles. There seems to be but one brood a season in the New York area. The infestation is much less severe and in most of the fields to which the party was taken, and which were considered among the worst infested, it was very difficult to find any borers. In no case was it clear that the borers had done much damage to ears. The most plentiful supply of borers in the New York area visited were found in the Mohawk Valley on land described as "The Island." The corn in this field had been cut. The field was bottom land much like many of the southern Indiana river bottoms. The low bluffs surrounding it and crooked channels cut by the river during high water were all overgrown with an abundance of weeds. The weeds were most of them infested with borers, many of which were identified as native species, but some of which may have been corn borers. In this field it was difficult to estimate the percentage of the damage, because many of the ears had been damaged by blackbirds, and, as stated above, the corn was cut and was in the shock. However, it was not difficult to find borers in the corn stubble. Certainly the borer has done very much less damage in New York State than the corn-ear worm has done in Indiana. The growers of sweet corn, we were informed, did not know their fields were infested. The buyers on the market also failed to discover the borer in field corn even from the infested districts in New York State, although an expert making a diligent search might discover the presence of the borer. We talked with several farmers in the New York area, none of whom had known that their fields were infested until entomologists had told them.

"I think it is generally agreed with regard to the New York situation that the damage caused by the borer is, from an economic standpoint, negligible, although some entomologists feel that the potential damage is great. There is every reason to believe, however, that the insect has been present in New York for some 10 years, with unrestricted opportunity to spread and become established. It must certainly have taken nearly this long to become disseminated over so wide a territory. If, during this time, it has become no worse at any point than it actually has become, it is questionable whether it is likely to be of much economic importance. The fact that much less damage has been done in New York State than in Massachusetts may be due to the fact that the insect has only one brood in New York State, whereas it has two in Massachusetts.

"Possibilities of control: It was apparent to the Indiana representatives that there is a considerable difference in point of view between State officials in New York State and the members of the Federal Horticultural Board. The New York Commission of Agriculture, for instance, appeared very anxious to obtain Federal funds to be used in New York State in a campaign to exterminate the borer. With the facts fresh in mind as to the wide range of plants which the borer infested in Massachusetts, with an area of over 200 miles infested in New York State admitted by the New York State officials, the idea of undertaking to exterminate the borer in New York State seems preposterous. The New York State officials, however, fall back on the contention that, inasmuch as the borer is found only on corn in New York State, no other plant need be considered in a campaign for control or extermination. This fact is, in the judgment of the writer, open to question. Even if corn, however, is the only plant infested in New York State, it is by no means certain—indeed, it is extremely unlikely—that the area now known to be infested includes all of the territory which actually is infested. Even if an exterminating campaign, therefore, were to be undertaken and were to be confined to the effort to exterminate the borer on corn, there would be a very serious question of the wisdom of spending large sums to destroy every infested cornstalk in the area of infection now known, with every probability that new areas of infestation in New York State, Massachusetts, and New England and the Middle West will be discovered within the next few weeks. The Indiana representatives were greatly interested, however, in an experiment which will be made this fall in Massachusetts to exterminate the borer on an area of some 42 square miles. Very elaborate preparations have been made for this fight. Machines have been constructed into which will be fed all succulent material, weeds, etc., which may be collected from gardens, roadsides, fields, etc. This will be crushed in such a manner that any borers contained will be killed. All cut-over ground along the roadsides, gardens, back yards, waste lands, etc., will then be gone over with fire. Powerful machines for spraying burning oil have been prepared for this purpose. The result of this attempt to exterminate the borer over a relatively small area will be watched with interest. In the opinion of the writer, however, it will be impossible, even at the very large expense incurred.

"The possibilities of quarantine: The Indiana representatives were greatly interested in studying the field conditions in Massachusetts and New York State with a view to determining the possibility of an effective Federal quarantine on infested territory, thus protecting the balance of the country against the possibility of invasion by the borer. When it is recalled, however, that a new infestation has recently been found in Pennsylvania, that there is strong likelihood that infested areas will be found in the Ohio Valley, a quarantine of infested districts in Massachusetts and New York is made ridiculous. It is impossible even in the New England section to draw a line about the infested territory with any likelihood that new infestations will not be found outside of that line as soon as there has been time to make a reasonably thorough search. A quarantine is thus made impossible if for no other reason than because it is impossible to define the area which ought to be quarantined. When it is considered, moreover, that sweet corn is often sold from home stands in front of the farmer's residence, and that motor travel is continuous throughout New England, and that any automobile party buying roasting ears at a farmer's place might spread the infestation to remote territory, and in view of the impossibility of controlling such sales and such transportation, the enforcement of a quarantine is seen to be doubly impossible.

"Moreover, large areas in New Hampshire and Vermont and in the States south of Massachusetts are dependent for thousands of tons of foodstuffs on the trucking area about Boston. New Hampshire officials last spring, after viewing the whole situation, said emphatically that they would much prefer to take the corn borer into New Hampshire than to have New Hampshire deprived of its food supplies from Massachusetts.

"What should Indiana do? Indiana should know definitely whether the borer is within the State or not. For this purpose we propose immediate surveys with the assistance of specialists detailed for this work from Mr. Worthley's force of Federal scouts. There is reason to believe that the borer was introduced in this country some 10 years ago on shipments from Austria-Hungary of broom corn. Several hundred tons of this broom corn came into the Ohio Valley. Every effort should be made to ascertain whether any Indiana broom-corn factories used any of this material and search should be made for the borer in the neighborhood of such factories if any are located. If any Indiana sweet-corn canners have imported seed from infested areas in Massachusetts it is possible that the borer may have been introduced with the sweet-corn seed. Immediate steps are being taken to find out whether any Indiana canners have such imported seed, and surveys will be directed at once to any territories to which such seed may have been distributed. No quarantine should be imposed in Indiana for a few weeks until there has been further opportunity to determine whether the borer is already within the State, and if so, how much territory may be infested.

"If the borer is not found or it appears to be restricted to a very small area, importation of pop-corn seed or sweet-corn seed on the cob should be prohibited. It may be that importation of all seed corn on the cob should be forbidden.

"In any event, Indiana sweet-corn canners should be advised fully of the borer situation, and should be advised to pool their orders, so far as possible; send an agent east to close contracts for seed; arrange to have such an agent accompanied by a competent corn-borer specialist; and to satisfy himself that seed for Indiana has been grown in noninfested areas. Such seed should be shelled after being inspected and approved for type and none shipped into Indiana on the cob.

"The Indiana representatives can not subscribe to the alarmist campaign apparently being conducted by the National Association of Commissioners of Agricu ture. We do not believe that the 'corn crop and all that goes with it is doomed' unless the borer is exterminated. We believe that a large measure of borer control may be found in the practices of clean farming and good husbandry. Additional protection may be obtained through planting corn at the right time. We believe that abundant appropriations should be made immediately available by Congress to enab e the Bureau of Entomology and the Federal Horticultural Board to make thorough surveys and to determine at the earliest possible moment every section of the country in which the corn-borer infestation already may have started. We believe that wherever the borer has appeared measures should be taken at once by State and Federal authorities to see that seed corn on the cob is not shipped out, as this appears to us to be by far the most probable means of dissemination at the present time. We believe that the effort to determine whether extermination is possible is well worth making on the limited area in Massachusetts, although we are skeptical as to the success of any extermination campaign and doubtful as to whether the great expense would be justified as an economic measure. We believe that the amount of Federal appropriations necessary to enable the Federal departments to wage the most effective possible campaign against the borer can be determined much more accurately by the Bureau of Entomology and Federal Horticultural Board, who have responsibility for the work done than by State commissioners of agriculture."

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to strike out Part XIII of the treaty. [Putting the question.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understood that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] was to speak on the amendment this morning. I think he did not understand that the treaty is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair waited for a while before calling for a vote.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the Senator from Illinois did not hear the call of the Vice President for a vote upon the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I certainly did not, for I wish to ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood that a roll call would be taken on the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is no vote if the Senator wants to speak.

Friday, October 31, Monday, November 3, and Tuesday, November 4, 1919.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the second part of the treaty will, by consent, in the event we ratify without adopting the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to strike out the article I refer to in Part XIII, result possibly in economic pressure being applied to our Government and our people in the event we do not obey the international labor body passing upon various questions. Those questions may refer directly to our domestic affairs. In fact, they are enumerated here by way of example so as to remove any question of the character of subject that comes before the league of nations or the international labor body. Part XIII of the treaty, section 1, refers to the organization of labor, reciting:

And whereas conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship, and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperiled; and an improvement of those conditions is urgently required, as, for example—

Here are the arguments used, of the very kind that refer to our domestic problems, to illustrate the scope of the investigation and findings made by the international labor body—as, for example, by the regulation of the hours of work, including the establishment of a maximum working day and week, the regulation of the labour supply, the prevention of unemployment, the provision of an adequate living wage, the protection of the worker against sickness, disease, and injury arising out of his employment, the protection of children, young persons, and women, provision for old age and injury, protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own, recognition of the principle of freedom of association, the organization of vocational and technical education and other measures.

If there is anything left out of the illustrations of the scope of the investigations in these enumerations, we have not found it in this Chamber, nor have any of the large States of the Union having great industrial organizations found it. They include, Mr. President, every subject on which New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and many other States have legislated. It continues:

Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labor is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries.

The high contracting parties, moved by sentiments of justice and humanity as well as by the desire to secure the permanent peace of the world, agree to the following.

What I have read is the preamble of Part XIII of the treaty with Germany.

When these subjects in the preamble are examined, therefore, it will be found that they leave practically nothing that is not used by way of illustration; they cover the whole ground of labor legislation. A preamble here, as in other instances, indicates the range of subjects embraced in the subsequent provisions.

I wish to remind the authors of this document, as well as some Members of the Senate, that the various States of the Union enacted progressive and liberal labor laws before Great Britain and other European nations. Our States were found legislating upon the subjects mentioned in this preamble long before his distinguished highness the Sultan of Hejaz ever heard of labor legislation.

Hejaz is a State created out of the Arab population of western Asia. I have some Arabs among my constituents. I do not believe many of them are naturalized. They dwell down below the board of trade, southwest of the foot of La Salle Street, Chicago, for a time quite a large colony, some 350 or 400. We also have in our constituency some Chinese. There are in Cook County 400 Chinese voters. It does not do to ignore the Chinese vote. They might be conclusive in certain wards or in certain closely contested elections. Those Chinese were born in Chicago, Ill. They have the birthright of an American citizen. They are registered before the board of election commissioners; their habitation, street number, and the like, duly accounted for; and they are entitled to all the rights of franchise that belong to the Caucasian. They are recognized by the laws and by the local rules of elections in our State. We have in our country a polyglot people, but that is no reason why we ought to surrender our domestic labor affairs to the control of the European or Asiatic Governments whence some of these people come.

But, Mr. President, it is a work of supreme insolence for the preamble of Part XIII, and the subsequent sections of this part, to undertake to instruct some of the States of the United States how to legislate on the regulation of these labor questions. In 1897 and in 1899 the first juvenile delinquent court act so far as I know in the world—and I know the first one in the United States—was enacted in Illinois. The original act was in 1897, and the amendatory act, after two years' experience perfecting and applying it, as a result of valuable experience for that period, came in 1899. This was a juvenile-court act to deal with juvenile delinquents that were growing up gradually in the larger cities of the State, especially in Chicago and Peoria and certain others.

The vast body of forsaken children, abandoned by their parents, either criminal or semicriminal, the illegitimate children whose parents had left them to the tender shelter of a dry-goods box or under a warehouse, or to the care of a foundling asylum that took the earliest opportunity to shift their responsibility upon the general public, were gradually furnishing recruits to the criminal population of the larger metropolitan centers.

Some remedy was required. It was given by the statute to which I have referred, resulting in the creation of a school for boys, in which from 500 to 1,000 of the juvenile delinquents are committed by proper court orders, by the county court outside of Cook, and the juvenile court inside of Cook County.

These regulations take the boy, or the girl, for whom a separate school is established, and seek to reclaim them from their ways. We have a farm of nearly 600 acres at the boys' school, and also a farm and garden at the girls' school. They are taken out of their criminal or semicriminal surroundings, put in the school, and given humane care. The house father and house mother take a certain number of them, not exceeding 40 as a rule, in a cottage. They do not put them all in a large building, but have adopted the cottage plan, and the house father and the house mother take the boys and care for them. The boys have their rooms, and their own personal belongings that they are allowed to have after they come to the place. They are given every opportunity, including school, regular hours, work on the farm or in the garden, and every form of useful occupation.

As a part of this system there is a child-labor law. The child-labor law has existed in our State for many years. It has been well enforced by the State. An effort was made by the Congress to regulate the matter. It met with an adverse decision in the Federal Supreme Court. It was beyond the power of Congress so to legislate.

These two matters are intimately connected with the subject of this preamble. Necessarily, child labor will be considered by the international organization. It must, in the nature of things, lead to some recommendation. Just what Great Britain may do, or France, or Italy, or the various European countries we do not know. They may take some action similar to our State legislation, or the unconstitutional bill passed by Congress. The difficulty mentioned by the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] must then arise. However, when they undertake to legislate on that, it removes from the several States of the United States and from Congress all future legislation not in express terms by the powers granted or by the prohibition made, because the several nations reserve to themselves the usual rights of sovereignty, even if nothing were provided in the treaty; but to make assurance doubly sure, there are provisions in the treaty which, if we ratify it unamended, if we vote down the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], will leave us consenting to place in the hands of the various other nations of the world a club with which to smite us if we refuse to take the recommendation of the international labor organization. We thereby effectively surrender practically our power to regulate our domestic affairs, either by Congress or by the several States of the Union.

I predict that our labor legislation, our remedial and humane features adopted in so many of the State laws, beginning with Wisconsin, which is an essentially progressive State in such legislation, and with all the States of the Middle West of an industrial character and reaching to the Atlantic coast, will no longer be binding if the league and treaty are ratified in their present form. I resent the assumption, coolly made by this document, that other parts of the world can advise us better than we can advise ourselves upon domestic questions of this character. Who was it that passed the first child-labor law? The State. Who passed the first act regulating the hours of labor for women? The State. Who passed the first compensation law for injury, abolishing the ambulance chasers and the damage lawyers in the cities? The States did it. Who first abolished the necessity of employing lawyers and paying 25 or 50 per cent of the judgment finally collected? That was done by the States. The old-age pension is the only thing in which England led the way. Their act of 1911 was the first old-age pension act for industrial workers in Europe as well as in the Western Hemisphere. That, however, is not a very complete act. It has been amended several times.

The preamble of the treaty and all of Part XIII carry the assumption that the international labor body will be more competent to deal with our internal labor problem than we are ourselves. These various articles set forth that—

> A permanent organization is hereby established for the promotion of the objects set forth in the preamble.

Those are the various ones which I have read.

> The original members of the league of nations shall be the original members of this organization, and hereafter membership of the league of nations shall carry with it membership of the said organization.

Then it provides in subsequent articles for the members to be represented by various delegates and by their advisers. Everything on the docket for investigation at the international labor body's meeting will entitle the member nation to send not only delegates but to send advisers upon each separate item on the docket that is made up for the meeting. The agenda referred to in the treaty is precisely in effect the same thing made up in a court docket. The matters that come before that section for hearing are made up and delegates are entitled to two advisers upon each subject. One delegate can go on child labor, another on woman labor, another on old-age pension, yet another on personal injuries and compensation, yet another on hours of labor and the minimum wage scale, and all the other various items that enter into the labor controversy, and two advisers may be sent upon each subject.

I do not know, Mr. President, where the limitation as to expense may be. Who would name these advisers would likely depend upon an act of Congress or upon the Executive, who, in the absence of legislation, would probably assume the power to name delegates. It would remain, therefore, for Congress by appropriate legislation to provide funds to meet the expenses.

Various articles provide for the machinery for carrying these powers into effect. An international labor office is created "under the control of a governing body consisting of 24 persons, appointed in accordance with the following provisions." Then it sets out in detail that 12 persons shall represent the Governments; six persons elected by the delegates to the conference representing the employers, and six persons elected by the delegates to the conference representing the workers. Then, after various details are taken care of, it is provided in article 405 that:

> When the conference has decided on the adoption of proposals with regard to an item in the agenda it will rest with the conference to determine whether these proposals should take the form (a) of a recommendation to be submitted to the members for consideration with a view to effect being given to it by national legislation or otherwise, or (b) of a draft international convention for ratification by the members.

It may be referred to the several member nations to be made effective by legislation enacted by the proper bodies of each nation, or it may take the form of a reference to be ratified by each nation. In the event of the ratification plan, or, as it is called here, of a draft international convention for ratification, whenever the nations concerned ratify it, it becomes binding as to the nations so ratifying. If all of them in Europe ratify and we do not, we thereby become an outlaw nation. Let us see what happens under those conditions:

> In framing any recommendation or draft convention of general application the conference shall have due regard to those countries in which climatic conditions, the imperfect development of industrial organization, or other special circumstances make the industrial conditions substantially different and shall suggest the modifications, if any, which it considers may be required to meet the case of such countries.

Then, referring to member nations, it provides:

> Each of the members undertakes that it will, within the period of one year at most from the closing of the session of the conference, or if it is impossible owing to exceptional circumstances to do so within the period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment, and in no case later than eighteen months from the closing of the session of the conference, bring the recommendation or draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action.
> In the case of a recommendation, the members will inform the secretary general of the action taken.
> In the case of a draft convention, the member will, if it obtains the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, communicate the formal ratification of the convention to the secretary general—

That is, to Sir Eric Drummond, who is now secretary general of the league—> and will take such action as may be necessary to make effective the provisions of such convention.

> If on a recommendation no legislative or other action is taken to make a recommendation effective, or if the draft convention fails to obtain the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, no further obligation shall rest upon the member.

In that event it does not bind us. No question of the kind referred to by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] could arise, because there is no treaty obligation assumed. But the matter does not rest here, for here is the economic weapon placed in the hands of the ratifying nations:

In the case of a federal State, the power of which to enter into conventions on labour matters is subject to limitations, it shall be in the discretion of that Government to treat a draft convention to which such limitations apply as a recommendation only, and the provisions of this article with respect to recommendations shall apply in such case.

Under this provision Great Britain and all of her colonial dependencies may escape. Canada, under her claim of sovereignty, would be exempt. It is written with an eye single to the conditions of the British Empire. That country is farsighted in caring for her own. I now read from article 409:

In the event of any representation being made to the international labour office by an industrial association of employers or of workers that any of the members has failed to secure in any respect the effective observance within its jurisdiction of any convention to which it is a party, the governing body may communicate this representation to the Government against which it is made and may invite that Government to make such statement on the subject as it may think fit.

That is preliminary to one weapon, as if employers and employees did not now have sufficient difficulties to bring before the general public and without causing disputes to arise afresh with the sunrise of each day. Here is another section that not only in the capital city of every State in the Nation but in this Capital will cause resort to be made constantly to the various labor boards, annoying both to the laborer and the employer. As if that were not difficulty enough in our domestic affairs, to make confusion worse confounded, this section must come in, under which employers and labor representives themselves will be required to go beyond seas, for the conference meets at Geneva in the absence of affirmative directions by the league or by the international conference to meet elsewhere. Therefore the employees and the employers upon complaint will be constantly called to cross the sea, there to meet any charges that may be made against them by the authority of this treaty.

Then, after the hearings shall have been had at Geneva, in article 413 it is provided:

The members agree that, in the event of the reference of a complaint to a commission of inquiry—

The creation of which is provided for in a preceding section—

they will each, whether directly concerned in the complaint or not, place at the disposal of the commission all the information in their possession which bears upon the subject matter of the complaint.

In other words, there has been a hearing of the complaint, a finding made, and then a report by the commission of inquiry. Article 414 provides:

When the commission of inquiry has fully considered the complaint, it shall prepare a report embodying its findings on all questions of fact relevant to determining the issue between the parties and containing such recommendations as it may think proper as to the steps which should be taken to meet the complaint and the time within which they should be taken.

I anticipate in the cotton belt, for instance, where factories are developing in close neighborhood to cotton production, where child-labor laws are now within the power of the various States concerned, that this matter will be of vital consequence, because the last paragraph of article 414 is as follows:

It shall also indicate in this report the measures, if any, of an economic character against a defaulting government which it considers to be appropriate, and which it considers other governments would be justified in adopting.

Almost halfway around the world British engineers, along in the nineties, planned at the second Nile cataract one of the greatest engineering works in the world, the Assouan Dam in the River Nile being the result. It doubled the area of arable land subject to overflow in the whole valley of the Nile. Incidentally, it destroyed some of the ancient ruins of the time of the early dynasties of the Rameses and the Pharaohs, but it practically doubled the acreage of cotton land of the whole valley. It created vast reservoirs that caught the overflowing water during the flood seasons when it comes down from equatorial Africa, following the torrential rains of that region. It stores great quantities of water for the dry season, and with proper engineering facilities is the greatest irrigation project the world ever saw.

The labor question in Egypt and the Nile Valley is not an acute one. People looking for work are much more numerous there than are the opportunities for employment. The wages are correspondingly low. It is a tropical country, the standards of living are different from those in the north temperate zone, clothing and lodging do not become expensive, and, consequently, the economic conditions lend themselves to the production of cotton.

The long-fiber cotton of the Nile Valley is used for certain manufacturing purposes. It is a competitive article in our market with the long-fiber or sea-island cotton of certain of the Southern States. The upland or short-fiber cotton is an entirely different merchantable article. The Nile cotton and the sea-island cotton are used for laces, for fine underwear, for sewing thread, for ladies' lingerie, and articles that are required to be of a more expensive weave and structure. This cotton comes to our shores by way of England, and many million dollars' worth are entered at the port of Boston and sold in competition with our own sea-island cotton. The importation is beginning to affect our market; those who deal especially in the home-grown article are beginning to feel the effect in price. This engineering work was the beginning of the competition. The English are always long-headed in their philanthropic enterprises and in their governmental protectorates of the various countries around the world over which they exercise power. They propose to grow cotton of both varieties to supply the demands of their mills. They do not propose to be dependent upon the United States for cotton any longer than that development can be had.

Therefore when they control by economic means authorized in these articles our exports, it will be comparatively easy to bring in some regulation before the commission of inquiry that is distasteful or impossible under our laws or our methods of manufacture. It will be the easiest matter in the world for an English manufacturer in Manchester to make a complaint and to secure a finding, with their influence in the league and upon this commission of inquiry, that will make it impossible for us to comply. They can regulate, for instance, by such a finding as they see proper, the method of raising cotton, both upland and sea-island cotton, in the United States. They can limit ages, hours, and conditions of service either in factory or on the cotton plantation. That controversy having been provoked, they may proceed to a finding which will make it impossible for us to raise cotton and export it to their country. They are adepts in regulating the terms under which we go through their customhouses. It will be comparatively easy to contrive a finding that we can not comply with; and then, under this provision, the last paragraph of article 414, they can have the commission report what measures, if any, of an economic character shall be had against our defaulting Government. It is no more than her navigation laws of other days.

Great Britain, with her navy, can afford to make any commercial regulation she pleases. She can lay an embargo upon cotton. She can lay it on agricultural implements, as she has in effect already done. She can stop us from shipping by adverse regulations, either of duties or of burdensome consular provisions or of actual prohibition by an embargo, until we can not enter her ports anywhere in the United Kingdom of Great Britain or in any of her colonial dependencies; and she may, by her influence, reach every nation in Europe, Asia, and Africa. With those with whom she has influence in South America, she may bar their ports not only to the article named, but to all other merchantable products in our exports.

Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me that it is of some concern to us to know whether this provision shall be ratified by a vote of the Senate. We are in a condition, it is true, to resist it; but economic pressure applied in strict accordance with what the Senate ratifies, it being already approved by the Executive, puts us in the embarrassing position of having agreed to the embargo or other prohibitory or restrictive measures that may be leveled against us. How will we object to it, either by peaceable measures or by movements warlike in character, after having consented that those provisions shall be applied to us?

I see no reason for aliens interfering with our labor problems. We work them out to suit ourselves. We have been fairly successful in the United States not only in settling our controversies such as impend to-morrow but in legislation that justly cares for the rights of both employer and employee. It seems to me that it is an instance of insufferable impertinence for these nations to come in and undertake to tell us, in our domestic affairs, how we shall regulate our labor problems, or, in the event we do not agree with them, that they will apply economic pressure by refusing to open their ports to our merchant ships or placing burdensome duties upon us.

I said a while ago that Great Britain was an adept in finding such means of restricting imports. I wish particularly now to refer to a letter of August 28, 1919, in order to illustrate the method in which Great Britain obtains advantages with no such instrument in her hands as the one I have referred to in article 414.

Barnhart Bros. & Spindler are one of the oldest type founders and manufacturers of printers' specialties in the Middle West. In a letter from Chicago under the date given, addressed to myself, they refer to the following trade regulations now made, even in the absence of this treaty:

Last June a Mr. Radiguer, of Paris, France, was in the United States intending to buy a large amount of printing material. In fact, he left with our house a handsome order; also orders with other Chicago concerns dealing in printers' goods. In July, just before sailing for France, he wrote us that France had added 30 to 35 per cent to its tariff on printing machinery coming from the United States and but 15 per cent on that coming from Great Britain. This indicates that France wishes to buy all the printing supplies she needs from England or possibly from Germany.

Even if reciprocity and gratitude for favors done France does not give us a fair field for trade there, it would seem that the "most-favored-nation" policy entitles us to fair treatment.

Is it not possible and proper for our Government to make a vigorous protest against such unfair discrimination?

This letter is signed by Mr. French, the president of the company.

Again, in the Middle West are some of the largest agricultural-implement plants in the world. That country was not only the inventor of the corn planter and various improved forms of agricultural implements, including wheat drills, but it has become the manufacturer of supplies that go around the world under normal conditions. The wheat fields in the Black Sea country were drilled with machines made in this belt. Plows made in the same country were sent all over the wheat area of Russia and part of France. With the armistice, dealers in agricultural implements thought that certainly conditions would now favor the restoration of the trade which they enjoyed before the war. Nearly the entire export trade to Europe is gone, as a necessary result of warlike conditions. It had been somewhat interfered with in South America and Central America because of the lack of shipping facilities; but with the return of normal peace conditions, and more tonnage being available for shipping purposes, it was supposed that an opportunity would be given to restore those market conditions. For some reason—I am unable to say why—the Government has resolutely refused to give to agricultural-implement dealers licenses to engage in the export trade. In the case of the single agricultural implement of corn planters, for instance, about 80,000 corn planters are required to supply the domestic market. Our export trade requires a considerable number, although for other forms of agricultural implements the requirements are much larger. A resumption of these exports would only restore to us the trade we had before the war. It is entirely a normal condition. It asks us for nothing new. It only gives to us what we had under ordinary trade relations with other countries.

It seems, however, that in portions of Europe we are not permitted to enter if we wish, even if we have the proper license from the proper authorities in our country, prior to the ratification of the peace treaty. The following appears in a cablegram from Rome:

Owing to restrictions on the importation of American-made tractors, binders, and other agricultural implements, American representatives of these firms are compelled to stand idly by and watch the French and British makers, who are allowed to enter.

A prewar agreement between Italy, France, and England permits this discrimination, which now puts American machines under the recent new restrictions. While special permits may be obtained, the difficulties of red tape practically eliminate American makes.

Further complications enter the situation because the Italian Government has started a plant for similar machines, and the output is a copy of a well-known American machine. Initial contracts have been closed for $3,000,000 product. It is generally conceded American machines are superior, but they can not surmount these handicaps. That Italy is showing great fortitude and patience in "carrying on" as it is despite the lack of coal is the opinion of Edward H. E. Beckert, of New York City, consulting engineer for the Standard Oil Co. Beckert is in Italy in connection with construction enterprises by his firm, the nature of which can not be divulged at present. From Rome he proceeds to Constantinople to take charge of the Standard Oil interests.

Mr. President, I ask that the whole of the article be printed without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"America and England should combine to furnish Italy coal and other necessities," said Mr. Beckert. "Italy at present is struggling and facing tremendous odds to reestablish her industries and manufactories, and unless the great powers like the United States and England see to it that Italy receives sufficient coal Italy can not continue.

STRONG FOR AMERICA.

"I find in coming in contact with business men from all parts of Italy that a decided pro-American spirit exists.

"While the Fiume incident is a sore spot and President Wilson's personal attitude is resented, a spirit of friendship and good will toward the American people is everywhere manifest. Italian business men realize also that the rate of exchange must be stabilized before they can engage in business with American firms on the prewar scale, and with this end in view they are bending their energies to strengthen their financial situation."

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a further difficulty, which seems to be entirely of British origin. It comes from regulations, burdensome in character, in entering the English market. A cablegram from London, as far back as last March, informs us that—

England is swarming with American business men, who came here fully expecting to reestablish their old connections as soon as the vital factor of tonnage permitted, but who now find themselves under heavy handicaps in view of the system of special licenses under which all imports will be controlled, at least until September 1.

These regulations are of the kind that can not be overcome and permit profitable trade.

This, too, Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

They realized that while the war was being waged the allied Governments had the first call on shipping, regardless of private interests. They have the tonnage now, but official barriers prevent their using it.

Some think they have a grievance. They kept up their British establishments at a loss during the war on the expectation of doing business again immediately after the close of the struggle.

The process of obtaining import licenses is that each prospective importer must present his case to the board of trade and to the controller of imports. Each case is dealt with on its merits, as the controller judges it from the importer's standpoint, and the board of trade's first consideration is whether the goods in question can be obtained from English firms. If they can, the license is refused. If the importer makes out a particularly strong case for special consideration, he will be permitted to ship limited quantities.

DOMINIONS ARE EXEMPT.

Conspicuous among the American products which find themselves against what virtually amounts to a stone wall are motors, boots, and typewriters, which cost from $200 to $300 in England to-day.

It is said a great British company which has hitherto devoted its plants to the manufacture of implements of war is transforming its works for the manufacture of typewriters.

The self-governing dominions of Great Britain are exempt from the difficulties the Government's policy imposes on foreign merchants.

The situation is looked upon as the beginning of an important chapter in the after-the-war economic adjustment.

Arguments of the free traders have been roughly summarized by the Morning Post, which is the strongest protectionist newspaper in Great Britain. It also points out the possible weakness of the temporary licensing measure.

Free-trade newspapers are also criticizing the Government's policy regarding importations, which was first disclosed by Sir Auckland E. Geddes, minister for national service and reconstruction, in the House of Commons on Monday. The newspapers denounce this proposal as an attempt to introduce protection without any mandate from the voters. Insist that a great majority of the voters are opposed to a protective system, and declare that England is still a free-trade country at heart. They say that "Great Britain gained her commercial and financial supremacy through free trade and can hold it only by free trade."

IMPORTERS FEEL HANDICAP.

One point on which newspapers of all shades and views on the tariff are agreed is that, after British manufacturers and merchants have enjoyed the sort of protection afforded to them by the license system, the "vested interests" will have been built up, or at least fostered, which will make it difficult to revert to a free-trade basis.

From the viewpoint of importers, the license system handicaps them with all the disadvantages of a protective tariff without its stabilizing virtue of certainty. They say that with a protective tariff of 30 or 50 per cent, or any specific rate, they would know where they stand and might adjust their prices and do business in accordance with well-known conditions.

At present they do not know whether to plan to do any business, because they can not count on being licensed to import any given quantity of products, or on being prohibited altogether from making imports.

GOLD BARRED AT PRESENT.

The Government, however, is able to present strong reasons for special measures. British industries have been torn to pieces by the war. They have been compelled to give up all ordinary business, transform their plants into munition factories, and take orders from the Government. They have virtually submerged themselves in the Government machine and now claim that the Government is under obligations to give to them help and protection in the broadest sense during a breathing spell sufficient for them to readjust themselves to peace conditions.

The board of trade announced to-day that the general license permitting the importation of British Empire products and manufactures will not at present apply to gold or articles containing gold, except when consigned direct to the Bank of England. It will also not apply to spirits, except brandy and rum, but it will include hops.

Mr. SHERMAN. Another article I have indicates yet a further provision of Great Britain's application of red tape and burdensome trade restrictions. The article is copied verbatim from the Times of India, a large and influential newspaper of British India, under date of September 12, 1919. I shall not read it at length, but only in substance give its provisions.

An embargo is laid on the export of hides from the British East Indies. It is not an embargo in express terms, which would be too palpable, but a duty of from 10 to 15 per cent on exports is levied at the customhouses, so that that enabling act gives to Great Britain and her colonial dependencies, exempted under the regulation, the advantage of an exclusive market for all of the hides going to the tanneries of Great Britain and her colonial possessions.

This article I also ask to have printed without reading, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE INDIAN EMBARGO ON HIDES AND SKINS.

The following article is copied verbatim from the Times of India, a large and influential newspaper of British India, under date of September 12:

"In introducing the Indian tariff act amendment bill, the Hon. Sir George Barnes said: 'The effect of this bill can be stated in a very few words. It is to impose an export duty of 15 per cent on hides and skins with a rebate of 10 per cent to hides and skins exported to other parts of the empire and there tanned. Its object is to insure that our hides and skins shall be converted into fully tanned leather or articles of leather so far as possible in India, and failing this in other parts of the empire instead of being exported in a raw state for manufacture in foreign countries. I need not take up the time of honorable members with any detailed account of the history of the hide and skin trade in India. It is a common knowledge to all honorable members that before the war the hide trade was monopolized by the Germans and at that time the tanning trade in India was comparatively very small. Great changes were brought about by the war, immense quantities of leather were required for war purposes for soldiers' boots, for saddlery, and for equipment of various kinds, and sufficient tanneries for converting the hides into leather were not available outside Germany. The result was that tanneries for this purpose sprang into existence in India under the guidance and with the friendly assistance of the Indian Munitions Board. In this way India rendered an immense service to Great Britain and her allies in the war and incidentally greatly benefited herself. While the tanning of hides in India was fostered and stimulated by war requirements, the tanning of skins was injured, for it was found necessary to divert the energies of the skin tanners to the tanning of hides for military requirements. During part of the war it was unfortunately necessary to prohibit absolutely the tanning of skins. The present position is that we have in India at the present time some hundreds of tanneries for the tanning of hides, a large number of which have come into existence in order to satisfy military requirements during the war; we have in fact the foundation of a flourishing tanning industry. But there is reason to fear that it may tend to dwindle and disappear with the diminution of military requirements if some other support is not given. We want to keep this industry alive and we believe that in this case protection in the shape of a 15 per cent export duty is justifiable and ought to be effective.

A MEASURE OF PROTECTION.

"'It is clearly just also that the same measure of protection should be extended to the tanners of skins whose business, as I have already stated, was injured by the necessities of the war. Though Indian tanneries have enormously increased in number during the past three years, we can only deal with the comparatively small proportion of the raw hides and skins which India produces, and it is to the advantage of India and the security of the Empire in general that this large surplus should, so far as possible, be tanned within the Empire, and with this end in view the bill proposes a 10 per cent rebate in respect of hides and skins exported to any place within the Empire. I should add that it is proposed to limit by notification the benefit of this rebate to hides and skins actually tanned within the Empire, and Indian hides and skins reexported from the Empire for the purpose of being tanned abroad will not be entitled to any rebate. I need not tell you, sir, that the effect of the bill on the producers of raw hides and skins has been most carefully examined by our expert advisers. We have no desire to benefit the Indian tanners at the expense of the Indian cattle owners or dealers in hides and skins. We are advised that the world demand for Indian hides and skins is so great that there is no risk of any injury being done. We have no cause to be afraid of the competition of the raw hides and skins from other countries. In the world's leather market India has almost a monopoly in respect of skins and produces such a very large proportion of the lighter types of hides, which are far the most suitable for certain purposes, that the world will never be able to do without Indian hides in one form or another. In conclusion, the bill is an effort to keep the tanning industry on its feet. The next few years will be years of difficulty and danger owing to the changed conditions and reduced demands for the army, but when the years are passed I believe that the future holds out a promise of great possibilities for the tanning industry in India. We have the hides, the skins, and practically all the tanning materials ready to our hands and an almost unlimited world demand for leather. It is one of the most promising Indian industries, and we hope that the beginning, which has been so well made, has a bright and successful future before it.'"

TANNERY SCHOOLS.

The Hon. Mr. Crum said that he thought it proper that the duty should be kept no longer imposed than was necessary to launch the industry in India. As far as he was concerned, it was a very simple bill, and it seemed to be quite satisfactory, but he wanted to refer to two points mainly connected with the bill. India could not help importing hides and skins from England, but in order to give the bill a practical shape it was necessary to see that a large number of Indian youths were educated in the industry of tanning. He suggested that a part of the duty which was proposed should be set apart for starting one or two schools of tannery in India. If some schools were located in different parts of India, and if necessary staffs for such schools were imported from England, he was quite sure that within a few years there would be in India an industry of tannery which might meet the demands of the country. He pointed out that the exporters of raw hide and skin would not give support to the bill chiefly on the ground of the effect it will produce on them, but, anyhow, the amelioration of the problem depended on the lines he suggested.

The Hon. Mr. Nigel Paton thought the bill was the first fruit of the labors of the industry commission, and it was the first step toward the industrial regeneration of India.

The motion was further supported by the Hon. Mir Asad Ali and the Hon. Sir Dinshaw Wacha. The afterthought of the bill was the harbinger of similar other measures.

The Hon. Mr. Sarma congratulated the Government on the initiation of their economic policy.

The Hon. Pundit Malaviya thought it was a great tragedy that in spite of all resources and economic supply of raw hides, the Government should not start tanning industries in India but grant a rebate to countries which imported hides.

The Hon. Sir George Lowndes, replying to Pundit Malaviya, said that what was proposed under the bill was to find an outlet for the surplus products of this country.

The Hon. Sir George Barnes, replying to the debate, said all contracts would be respected, provided they were contracts with a country to which export was not prohibited. Replying to Pundit Malaviya, he said the Government had only a limited amount of money to spend in developing the tanning industry. It was the intention of the Government to help the individual tanner and not crush him by Government enterprise.

The motion to introduce the bill was accepted.

Mr. SHERMAN. Another article which I find in a cablegram gives the reason for these various restrictions on agricultural implements. It says that "Advantages shall be given to those implements made in the British Isles." At the close of the war, or upon the signing of the armistice, many of their ammunition plants were of the kind to be readily remodeled for industrial purposes. Among the different undertakings provided for were those manufacturing agricultural implements. The patents have expired on all the binders, the mowers, the corn planters, the wheat drills, the harrows, the disks, many of the tractors, and other agricultural implements patented and manufactured in our own country. Great Britain is taking advantage of those expirations. The advantages held out to her domestic manufacturers have led them in many cases to buy, at a nominal price, the ammunition plants and convert them into agricultural implement houses. These advantages are now evident in the Italian market. The exports of agricultural implements have gone from Great Britain to various parts of Europe.

I can understand, Mr. President, why Great Britain would take that advantage by making such regulations. It is entirely in accord with her domestic industrial rehabilitation. I can not understand, Mr. President, why our own departments in this country refuse to our agricultural implement manufacturers the licenses necessary to engage in that export trade, and to go into that country and make an effort, if they wish, to regain some of their lost business. It may be a mere coincidence, but I have known many persons to be convicted of various offenses on circumstantial evidence not stronger than the action of the departments in Washington in our own country in keeping our exports out of Europe, in order that Great Britain may have free access to those markets. How long until our Government begins to think of our country and our people?

If this burns so well in the green wood, Mr. President, what will it do in the dry? If such advantages can be procured under present conditions, before the ratification of the treaty is made, before the international labor body has begun its operations, what will it be after we have ratified the treaty and put in the hands of Great Britain, France, Italy, or a combination of nations, the economic instrument of oppression found in article 414 of the treaty? This is a question, it seems to me, that is of vast importance to our own country.

It is especially significant when it is taken with an article of last July, cabled from London, from which it appears that Australia is beginning to consider seriously the question of abandoning her open ports, or her tariff, which stimulates imports and becomes protective to her manufacturing or producing centers. The same question is agitated in the Westminster Gazette, according to this cablegram. There will not only be the advantage of economic pressure in the event we do not accept the recommendations of the labor body but there is the rising tendency to build up at the customshouses barriers in the form of discriminating duties against our exports. That is entirely proper, being within the reach of any country as a means either of revenue, or avowedly for other purposes. Taking them altogether, Mr. President, it seems to me that these are very dangerous provisions.

The motion by the Senator from Wisconsin to strike out these provisions in the league of nations, article 23, as I remember, would render harmless those provisions in the treaty. At least, it would put it in a form where, if the motion should prevail, by proper reservations we could save our rights.

There are some other features of this I would like to consider, but I would rather not go on to-night, Mr. President, if it is probable that an adjournment is to be taken. But if not, I can proceed.

Monday, November 3, 1919.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, on Friday evening, at the time the Senate adjourned, I was remarking upon certain phases of foreign commerce. I had not completed the material which I wished to present. I now add a cablegram, which indicates a very unsatisfactory state of our foreign markets, not only at present, but presages a very disturbed condition in the future. This was dated at London the 31st of last August. It shows that the manufacturers in Great Britain, France, and Italy have been unofficially instructed to stop importing from the United States, and to confine their business as far as possible to dealing with each other. I said the story might be denied, but that it was undoubtedly true. Since then, Sir Aukland Geddes, president of the British Board of Trade, which is the British Department of Commerce, has in several public addresses confirmed the cable. The cable reads:

"It is no good for anyone to say, or for any nation to say," declared Mr. Geddes, "we would rely on America to see us through. Salvation for Europe is to be found in Europe and in Europe alone. I am told that America suffered little by the war, and that she will flood our markets with goods, that she will capture the markets of Europe. America is so placed that, like all the rest of us, she is in great difficulties in regard to the future of her trade."

Mr. SHERMAN at this point read from the Geddes article down to and including the words:

Labor leaders of the United States should realize the dangers they are facing.

Mr. SHERMAN. These men in Great Britain who represent union labor say that they must work or die. We appear to be in no such extreme condition in our country. We can remain idle and live. That seems to be the motto of a number of spokesmen for the labor world.

Following the prediction in this news item of last August we have had an iron and steel strike; we are now in the first day of a coal strike, in which 435,000 out of a potential 500,000 in the bituminous-coal fields are out on strike. Of this half million of bituminous-coal workers approximately 65,000 are outside of the union. They are the only ones to-day who are at work. So the predictions in this news item are literally being fulfilled. We have largely experienced such embarrassment as could come from the strike of the iron and steel workers. The backbone of that strike appears to have been broken. What will occur in the bituminous-coal strike remains yet to be developed.

We are reaping what we have sowed in our own domestic labor affairs. We could not expect to have other than these occurrences in view of the extreme carefulness, to say the least, with which this administration has handled all labor questions. We have not only legislated, because of the weakness of Congress, but by the aggressive conduct of the administration the executive department has literally filled all offices concerned with labor administration with those who go to the very limit asked in order to yield to such demands as are made. We could not expect anything else than these unreasonable lengths to which unionized labor, through their spokesmen, have gone. It only indicates that at last we may be in a condition where we will be no better off than the Old World.

This relates itself directly to the labor provision of the treaty. There are in our own country and in our city the international conference. They are undertaking to settle a number of questions which must be directly connected with our domestic labor situation. These men, representing a great variety of countries in the Old World, are meeting under a provision of the articles sought to be stricken out by the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I refer especially now to the provisions for the place of meeting in the annex following article 426:

First meeting of annual labor conference of 1919—

is the heading—

The place of meeting will be Washington.

It makes no difference whether we have ratified the treaty or given any authority to these alien delegates sojourning in our midst. They pay no attention to a mere matter of ratification. They are here busily engaged in conferring upon how they shall regulate the affairs of the entire world. For instance, last Saturday they were busily engaged in deciding whom they would admit into the conference, and there were divers threats made by those gentlemen, who hold the industrial fate of nations in the palm of their hand, that if we did not send in our delegates very promptly we would be barred from all future conferences.

This is a tremendous fulmination. It ordinarily produces instant action in a body like the Senate. We have been so accustomed here to crooking "the pregnant hinges of our knee" every time somebody spoke in the holy name of organized labor, that I am greatly perturbed tnat we have been in session all day to-day since this fulmination was made, and no lusty voice in the Chamber has been raised to give instant acquiescence so as to avoid the horrors of this threat. I fear that we are becoming irreverent, that we no longer are moved as we were in former days.

This threat goes on to state:

The labor group in the International Labor Conference is dissatisfied with the present basis of representation. They are criticizing the character of delegates. There is too much government and too little labor in the representation. An effort to throw out the votes of all countries which had not sent worker delegates and are represented only by governmental appointees will be made by the labor group in to-morrow's assembly. Decision to take this action was reached at a special meeting late to-day by the labor men. The provisions in the peace treaty under which the conference is held are considered especially responsible for the grievance over representation. These provisions allotted each country two delegates—one employee and one employer in the international federation of trade-unions.

The question was to have been brought up at once when the federation met in Washington last Monday, but the meeting was postponed until the German and Austrian delegates arrived.

Mr. SHERMAN at this point read from the Geddes article as follows:

The labor group in the International Labor Conference is dissatisfied with the present basis of representation, * * * but the meeting was postponed until the German and Austrian delegates arrived.

Mr. SHERMAN. So these persons are now sitting, undertaking to pass upon the delegates who shall sit in this international labor conference. When that shall have been done they will then take such action as will relieve the conditions in Europe, since we are not represented officially. The threat heretofore made, that unless delegates are forthcoming from unrepresented countries they will hereafter be barred, is a hint to us that drastic action may be taken while we are unrepresented. Therefore all these market conditions referred to in this cablegram of August 31, 1919, may be aggravated.

We will be unrepresented, we will have no voice to defend our interests, and before long we will be entirely barred, since it is a question of life and death and Europe is now engaged in caring for her own markets, to the extent of excluding us, excluding everything but the food that she actually needs to keep body and soul together. For every other thing for which she has found some means of supplying herself she is now beginning to consider how she shall bar absolutely, under burdensome restrictions, our export trade entirely. That is what this means where it says that manufacturers in Great Britain and Italy had been unofficially instructed to stop importing from the United States and to confine their business so far as possible to dealing with each other.

That led to the import duties of 30 per cent on the merchandise I referred to last Friday. It referred to a duty in the French market of 15 per cent on some articles of merchandise coming from Great Britain and her colonial dependencies. That is a double rate. It is in keeping with the information contained in the news dispatch from which I read this afternoon, that these countries are in a combination to secure their own trade and to exclude our manufactures entirely from foreign markets in Europe at least. How far it will go in South America, by the influences they will exercise, by the tonnage they control in all-ocean freight, and by diplomatic influences to be exercised remains yet to be seen.

It is well known that we can not under existing conditions get a ton of ocean freight out of certain South American countries for any of the European ports. None of the Argentine beef can be exported by any American packer. Every British packer in Argentina is allowed to slaughter at pleasure; he is given all the refrigerator tonnage in British boats, that so far have a monopoly of that species of transportation; an Englishman can obtain all the tonnage he requires; but not an American packer, large or small, can obtain a ton out of any South American port. Still we are to be charitable; we are to give all the needed help to suffering Europe.

I referred on Friday to the loan now being floated in this country by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Certain Chicago banks with certain other banks in New York City are underwriting the loan. J. P. Morgan & Co. head the list in New York. The sum of $250,000,000 gold is to be taken out of our markets in order to relieve the financial condition of Europe, and yet at the same time they are denying, by reason of their traffic arrangements, the exportation of South American beef killed by American packers. The necessary effect of that might not be of any consequence under other conditions, if other markets were open than the United States; but, Mr. President, the packers have certain stocks on hand in South America; they have certain contracts with the cattle raisers and the farmers of that region. A vast area of grazing land is accessible there and is under pasture. They are under contract to receive in a stipulated time a certain quantity of beef on the hoof. That contract was made without anticipation of shutting out that product from the English market. Closing the market by denying the use of transportation facilities, with no stress of war on, turns all this beef into the United States market.

In addition, our export trade from the United States has been destroyed. Since January, 1919, unless in the last month, for which I have no information, there was not a pound of American raised beef that found a market in England. The result is seen in our own market. Last July, when these results first began to be apparent in our domestic market, cattle fell from $20 and a fraction per hundred on the hoof to $14.35.

Therefore, Mr. President, the international labor situation, when coupled with traffic conditions and with burdensome restrictions placed upon our trade, make it impossible for foodstuffs or agricultural implements or other merchandise of domestic manufacture to obtain access to foreign markets. I repeat, it is no time now to be considering how we may further hamper ourselves and handcuff our facilities to take care of ourselves. I wish to have printed, without reading, the whole of this cablegram from London, being an article by Henry Hyde.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ELKINS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

GERMANY OPENS NEW WORLD WAR—WAR OF TRADE—ENGLAND UNITES LABOR AND CAPITAL TO RAISE PRODUCTION.

[By Henry Hyde.]

LONDON, August 31.

I have just been talking with the sales manager of a great firm of American exporters, who returned this morning from a business trip through Italy and France.

"The head of an important firm in Milan," he said, "took a letter from his file and gave it to me to read. It came from a factory in Germany:

"'Our books show that at the beginning of the war your firm was indebted to us in the sum of 2,800 marks,' said the letter. 'We take pleasure in canceling that indebtedness. Let us start again with a clean slate. Our Herr Schmidt will call on you soon and show a full line of samples. We recognize that conditions with you are not exactly favorable, and we shall be glad to give you nine months' or one year's time on all goods bought. If you prefer to take advantage of the present rate of exchange, which is greatly in your favor, we offer the usual discounts for cash in 30 days.'"

SHOWS CHEAP GOODS.

The sales manager, who is a New York man, though he sells many goods made in Chicago, proceeded to show me his silk shirt and neck scarf, wrist watch, and several other articles he was wearing or had in his pockets. They had all been bought in Italy. He quoted the price paid for each, and, translated from Italian lira into dollars and cents at the present tremendously high rate of exchange, every price was ridiculously low.

Most of them were made in Germany and had been sold since the armistice in Italy. For instance, a beautiful pocketknife with a handle of one solid piece of mother-of-pearl. It had three blades of the best steel, and he paid for it in Milan at retail 4 lira, amounting at the present rate of exchange to less than 50 cents. The same knife at home would cost at least $2.

"I am going home on the first ship," he declared, "and get my firm to send me back with instructions to buy great quantities of these cheap manufactured goods. We could pay 100 per cent tariff on almost everything and still make big money."

EUROPE FOR EUROPE.

The other night I sent a cable stating that commercial men and manufacturers in Great Britain, France, and Italy had been unofficially instructed to stop importing from the United States and to confine their business, as far as possible, to dealing with each other. I said the story might be denied, but it was undoubtedly true. Since then Sir Auckland Geddes, president of the British board of trade, which is the British department of commerce, has in several public addresses confirmed the cable.

"It is no good for anyone to say or for any nation to say," declared Mr. Geddes, "we will rely on America to see us through." Salvation for Europe is to be found in Europe and in Europe alone.

"I am told that America suffered little by the war; that she will flood our markets with goods; that she will capture the markets of Europe. America is so placed that, like all the rest of us, she is in great difficulties in regard to the future of her trade."

HEAR OF BIG RAIL STRIKE.

By way of proof, the London papers to-day carry scare headlines stating that 1,000,000 United States railroad men and other workers are already on a strike, and that other millions are about to strike in many trades. American steel and iron mills are said to be refusing orders on account of threatened strikes. The picture is one of increasing alarm and confusion.

In contrast, the same papers to-day carry renewed appeals from recognized trade-union leaders of Great Britain urging the men to double production and to forget grievances until the nation is out of the financial weeds. The sensational appeal of Brownlie, head of the great machinists' union, is backed by William Appleton, secretary of the General Federation of Trades Unions, who declares: "We must work or die."; by Ben Tillett, member of Parliament and famous radical labor leader; and by a half dozen other of the most influential men in the labor movement. Rally of these men to the threatened cause of British industry, it is believed, will have great influence on the annual congress of trade-unions in Glasgow next month.

ECONOMY IN GOVERNMENT.

Coupled with this is a great campaign for governmental economy started by Premier Lloyd-George himself, whose letter threatening discharge to government officials who do not institute the strictest economy has caused a great sensation.

Manufacturers and labor leaders of the United States should realize the danger they are facing.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I now wish to return to the developments more in detail of the International Labor Conference in session in the city of Washington:

Labor delegates sought this delay in the program for the further purpose of preventing action prior to the arrival of the Germans and Austrians, it was said, as they are expected to be almost solidly in sympathy with the workers. By eliminating the votes of governmental delegates from countries without labor representation, and through the support of the governmental appointees of Germany, Austria, and other countries believed to side with labor as against capital, the labor-group leaders hope, it was said, to create a block strong enough to prevent the conference from taking any action unfavorable to it. A two-thirds vote is required on all conclusions of the conference.

The German and Austrian delegates sailed from Amsterdam on October 24 and should be here by Wednesday, according to W. A. Appleton, of England, president of the International Federation of Trade Unions. It was frankly admitted that their presence might produce an awkward situation.

That would be most deplorable, Mr. President—to produce "an awkward situation" here in our own Capital at the first labor conference that has been held. It only shows the extreme folly of attempting to function under an arrangement of this kind before we ourselves have ratified the treaty. We are helpless; we can not deport the delegates to this international conference. German labor leaders, extremely socialistic in their tendencies, and Austrian labor leaders of a like kind, are here. They are the "stormy petrels" of many an industrial war. They are here from all parts of the globe. There have come to Washington not only from England but from every corner of Europe, even from some of the Balkan Provinces, men who themselves are more concerned in fanning the flames of discontent in our domestic affairs than they are of promoting peace.

The International Labor Conference, Mr. President, is a menace to the continued domestic peace and good order of our own country. The radicals are here. They are here for no good purpose. Not all of them are radicals, but one firebrand is enough to consume a city. The cow down on De Koven Street in 1871 that burned up Chicago upset a lantern. That was enough to start the physical conflagration. In the irritated condition of our industrial life it is very easy for disturbances to blaze into a flame that will involve the whole industrial fabric of our country. In this crisis, with the iron and steel strike still unsettled, with such spokesmen as Mr. Foster and his aids, with such spokesmen in the pending bituminous coal strike as John L. Lewis and his aids, with the generally inflamed condition of certain men in the country who do not represent the respectable, staid, conservative element in the labor unions or in the industrial world outside the unions, it is no time now to assemble here an international conference of firebrands from all over the world. We have enough of our own.

If I were connected with the executive department and had authority in such matters, I know what I would do, and take the chances. We are not now living under normal governmental conditions. We might as well recognize that we are living under the regency of Tumulty and Mr. Baruch. So long as there is an interregnum, we ought especially to be careful to see that no untoward events happen. If I had the power, I would deport the members of this International Labor Conference, that are so busily engaged in giving us advice as to how to run everything in the world, including our domestic affairs. The extract I am about to read will indicate the character of some of the men we have already harbored in our midst:

OVERTURN "THE DIRTY, ROTTEN GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES," SAID TROTSKI.

The night before he started for Russia Trotski, speaking to several hundred of his East Side, New York, followers, said:

"I want you men to remain here and organize and keep on organizing until you destroy this dirty and rotten Government of the United States, while I return to Russia, bring on a revolution there, and stop Russia's war against Germany."

That is a quotation from Trotski's statement a short time before he left this asylum, to which he had escaped to avoid the consequences of his seditious conduct before coming here.

Some months ago the American Defense Society, keeping close track of the movement which was then under way for the purpose of carrying out Trotski's command to his followers, warned the officials of every leading city that efforts would be made by the socialists and anarchists and Bolshevists to bring about a revolution for the purpose of destroying the American Government. They were advised that the plan involved starting a strike first at one point and then at another, testing out at each place the ability of the strikers to completely capture that city, and the first city which came completely under the domination of these revolutionists was to be the signal for similar revolutionary activities in every city in America.

I read this in order to show how closely it tallies with actual developments:

Seattle was the first place at which the effort was tried, but the backbone of the mayor of that city broke the strike and saved the country from a general campaign of destruction and chaos.

Boston was another point at which the effort was made, and now the steel strike and many other strikes are merely the fulfillment of the statements made months ago by the American Defense Society in warning the officials of every city to be ready.

Since this article was given to the public press of the country the bituminous coal strike has assumed form and actually occurred and is to be added to those already enumerated.

These strikes are simply an effort to definitely carry out Trotski's command to his followers to be prepared at the proper time to overturn the "dirty, rotten Government of the United States." Trotski's speech was made in a German hall. He went from America through the cooperation of Germany, and possibly some Americans, for it is claimed that somebody in this country had sufficient influence to have this country ignore a reported request from the British not to permit his leaving America. He was landed in Russia through the cooperation of Germany, and what he did in Russia he and his followers and Germany unitedly are seeking to repeat in America.

There are many innocent men who are out on strikes, but every man in this country who to-day is on a strike is cooperating with Trotski, with the Bolshevists, and with Germany in their effort to overturn what Trotski called "the dirty, rotten Government of the United States."

He who does not understand this situation has little comprehension of the work that is under way. It is time for the American people to wake up.

Many laborers participating in the present coal strike have been misled. I do not mean to say that they are in sympathy with such as are referred to in the statement of Trotski. However, the man misled who quits his work injuries the public welfare as much as the man who quits through malicious design. There is, I believe, a great body of law-abiding union-labor men in this country, and when they understand to what base uses they are being led I look for a return on their part to their accustomed work. I believe our experience during the war proved that the great body of union labor is loyal and sound at heart.

Some of the leaders of the American Federation of Labor during the war showed that they were equally loyal and sound. I join with them cordially in promoting peace and good order. I do not believe they understand the articles referring to the international labor union, or they would be found back of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and favoring his motion.

To show the international character of the delegates sitting in this Capital, the evening news reports contain an account of a delegate from the British East Indies, found in the Evening Star of November 3, 1919. The labor conditions in the British East Indies are such as to make it impossible for any advice to us in our domestic situation to be given from that source. I shall not undertake to pronounce the name of this "striking figure at the international labor conference," but the reporter and the printer can get it. It is in the column I have marked. I ask that it be included in my remarks without reading the news item further.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STRIKING FIGURE AT INTERNATIONAL LABOR CONFERENCE.

[Picture.]

Bahman Pestonji Wadia, delegate from India.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one difficulty upon which I can not, as a practical matter, see a way to overcome. There is that wide difference in the industrial situation in many countries that makes it impossible here to confer with delegates from those countries to our profit. There is, for instance, such a very wide divergence in the methods of labor and in the wages paid that I am unable to see how anything of value can come to us from participation in this conference.

In the longshoremen's strike, for instance, that has been on in San Francisco for some time, the following is the scale of wages paid for the week of August 28 to September 3, 1919, by one of the steamship companies, to the longshoremen. The compensation runs from $65.50 per week to $80.25. Some of the stevedore gangs, however, average lower. Their compensation runs as low as $63.66 per week, and some as low as $57.50. The schedule of wages contained in the list from which I am now reading was fixed some time ago at a conference between the employers and the spokesmen of the several unions concerned. The Water Front Employers' Union dealt with the several representatives of organized labor, and arranged for these schedules. With these rates of compensation, which are on an equality with many other lines of labor, skilled and unskilled, and especially keeping in mind the schedules for railroad employees, I wish to make a comparison.

The Chinese railroad rate, for instance, in 1914 and 1919 is a very instructive thing. In 1919 the subinspectors on Chinese railroads received $660 per annum. I can say, parenthetically, that the compensation in Japan for like services, skilled and unskilled, runs very much the same. Through the fitters, headmen, coolies, gatemen, carpenters, firemen, yardmen, electricians, painters, and cleaners, and running through the various grades down through the shops, all of which have very recently been more or less concerned in the strikes we have had in our country, the rates of wages are given. Then, the rates of wages given in Japan run all the way from an increase of 25 per cent over 1914 to as high as 44 per cent; but in every instance the wages paid are so pitifully inadequate, as compared with our own, as to provoke almost derision when the comparison is made. When these scales are put alongside of the wages of a carpenter, an ironworker, a shopman of the terminals of our railways, or the longshoremen in the strike in New York City, the very great divergence is at once apparent. How these delegates coming from oriental countries—from the British East Indies, from Siam, Japan, China, Persia, from various points where they have the right to sit with an equal delegation from these industrial conferences—can be of value to us in settling our industrial or strike troubles, I am unable to see. Still, they are here. They are here under the articles referred to in the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, and in the annex that follows these articles.

I read these rates of wages only to show how greatly different the standards are in those countries whose delegates are here for the purpose of advising us what to do in matters of domestic concern.

I wish to put in the RECORD the longshoremen's scale of wages which I have referred to, and also the wages of the Chinese and Japanese occupations, without reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the American Economist of Sept. 19, 1919.]

SHIPYARD WAGES IN CHINA.

Take the shipbuilding industry. The wages in this line for the day fall far below the hourly wage of American shipyards. Consul General Anderson sends the following table of pay per day prevailing in one of the yards, the rates being given in Hongkong currency. The value of the Hongkong dollar averaged about 45 cents in gold in 1914 and about 80 cents in 1919:

Workmen.	1914	1919
Fitters	$0.87	$0.89
Fitters' assistants	.35	.29
Turners	.96	.95
Turners' assistants	.20	.26
Boiler makers	.80	.78
Boiler makers' assistants	.30	.30
Molders	.64	.65
Dressers	.48	.49
Coppersmiths	.66	.69
Electricians	.70	.64
Brass finishers	.72	.77
Sawmillers	.62	.64
Galvanizers	.55	.56
Pattern makers	.90	.94
Blacksmiths	[1].75	[2]1.27

[1] Includes strikers. [2] Does not include strikers.

He also gives the daily wage of the following tradesmen, which, he says, has not changed much during the war, although most of the work is done by contract: Carpenters and joiners, 60 cents per day; calkers, 55 cents; riggers, 75 cents; sailmakers, 80 cents; bricklayers and cementers, 55 cents; painters, 45 cents; and coolies, 40 cents.

CHINESE RAILROAD WAGE RATE.

Of importance to the same study of oriental wages is the following table of average hourly rates paid by an engineering concern in Yokohama, compiled for the British embassy at Tokyo and printed in the Iron Age:

Occupation.	Average rate of wages per hour, in cents.				Increase 1914 to 1918.

These are the rates for work done during the ordinary working hours (nine per day); but it is stated that overtime, which is paid for at the rate of time and a quarter, is now being regularly worked, with the result that average monthly earnings have increased much more than would appear from the table given above. The rate of increase calculated on monthly earnings ranges, in fact, from 60 to 150 per cent for the occupations given above. Simultaneously there has been a decline in the quality of the labor available. Many new projects have been floated during the last two and a half years, and there has been a great demand for labor in consequence. The employer who supplied this information states that in reality the cost of labor has nearly trebled since July, 1914.

OSWALD F. SCHUETTE.

[From the San Francisco Daily News of Oct. 2, 1919.]

The following is the pay roll for the week of August 28 to September 3 by one of the steamship companies operating in this port. The amounts are given exactly in order as they appear on the company's pay roll and in the order in which the men were put to work: $80.25, $74, $48, $71.50, $65.50, $73.75, $64, $74.25, $65.50, $80.25, $73.75, $74.50, $71.80, $73.60, $76.50, $73, $73.80, $65.50, $73.60, $37.25, $74.35, $78.30, $81, $55, $73.75, $73, $73.75, $73, $82.35, $74.80, $74.50, $73.15, $73.75, $73.75, $73, $61.75, $73.30, $73, $73, $62.50, $65.50, $69.25, $72.25, $73.60, $68.50, $64, $71.50.

The average wage paid these 47 men for that week is $70.76.

These longshoremen were paid $1 an hour straight time—that is, all time worked between the hours of 8 a. m. and 5 p. m. week days—and $1.50 per hour overtime, or for work performed between 5 p. m. and 8 a. m., or on Sundays or holidays.

Not all of the stevedore gangs, however, average $70.76 per week. Here are figures from another crew, which only averaged $63.66 for a single week, the week ending August 30: $63.25, $82.75, $57.50, $58.25, $63.50, $63.50, $81.50, $85.75, $52, $58.25, $59.50, $63.50, $64, $73.50, $58.25, $57.50, $63.50, $63.50, $48.75, $58.25, $57.50, $63.50, $75.25, $59.75, $58.25, $58.25, $63.50, $69, $58.25, $57.50, $59.50, $63.50.

These figures are a matter of fact that are of record. They are wages paid under union regulations.

We submit this schedule of wages for the thoughtful attention of the wage-earning men and women of San Francisco, so that they may have a better understanding of the relations that existed between ourselves and our men, and of the treatment we accorded them before the strike.

WATERFRONT EMPLOYERS' UNION.

Mr. SHERMAN. Connected with this subject vitally, I have a cablegram from London on industrial questions, showing that England's colonial dependencies are beginning to look out for the monopoly of their own markets. What an industrial conference here of representatives of various foreign countries can do to relieve the situation for us is more than human ingenuity can explain.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the San Francisco Call and Post of Monday, July 21, 1919.]

ENGLAND MUST ABANDON FREE TRADE, SAYS PRIME MINISTER OF AUSTRALIA.

(By Floyd Macgriff, International News Service Staff Correspondent.)

LONDON, JULY 19.

"Nothing is more certain than this: Unless a definite policy is adopted that will give the British manufacturers a preference in the home markets and to the overseas dominion a larger market within the Empire for their raw materials, not only will imperial trade suffer but the Empire itself will tend to disintegrate, for the surest tie is that of mutual self-interest. All things are now possible. We have come to the crossroads. The passing hours are deciding the destiny of the Empire."—W. M. Hughes, Prime Minister of Australia in farewell London address.

LONDON, JULY 19.

Will Great Britain adopt imperial trade tariffs and restrictions?

The answer to that question is of supreme commercial importance to the whole world. American manufacturers, as well as German concerns against whom such restrictions would be directed, are deeply interested in the answer that Great Britain will give to that proposal, which is favored even in high political circles.

As yet the British cabinet has not given any indication of what the answer will be, although the proposal has been laid before it.

Whether Great Britain is to reform her trade policy of generations' growth is likewise of great concern to home manufacturers.

Prime Minister Hughes of Australia, who has preached that it is high time that England abandoned free trade, has secured considerable following, including the Times, the Morning Post, Lord Milner, colonial secretary, prominent manufacturers and others.

For 18 months Premier Hughes has been an apostle preaching in his homeland the necessity of conserving the Empire's resources to the sole first call and use of the British. He has demanded closer trade unity between the homeland and dominions, saying foreign trade should be kept out so that there would be plenty of business for the close family partnership and so that industries could provide employment continuously.

DEMANDS PROTECTION.

Because Germany got such a grasp upon raw materials in British territories, owing to the interlocking German banking-industrial system, Hughes wants the Empire to protect itself now, so that in the future Germany will have to go elsewhere for her raw materials or buy them from Great Britain.

Since Great Britain controls the greater part of the storehouse of Africa, all of India, a great part of the Near East, besides the continent of Australia and near-by islands and the top half of North America—one-sixth of the world, in fact—a procedure of this sort would have far-reaching results. And this one-sixth produces at least a third of the world's supply of raw materials, if not more.

British opinion has been lining up for some time in two camps—one for continuing the free-trade policy of the past and the other for making needed changes that will give British industry some measure of protection.

PAPER IS FREE TRADER.

The Westminister Gazette, a free trader, says:

"If the Government is going to adopt Hughes's ideas and turn the Empire into a close preserve with German trade barred and other foreign trade heavily discouraged, the merchants, manufacturers, and shipowners ought to know it. If the Government is going to give him the preferences that he demands, which can only be on wool, meat, and corn, the public should know it.

"And again, if Sir George Perley's view that the products of the Empire should be used 'solely for trade within the Empire' is to prevail, that should be frankly stated to the supreme economic council and to our European allies, for plainly otherwise most of the economic provisions of the peace treaty will be on a false basis, and many of the assurances that we are giving, both to the enemy and to our allies, will be scraps of paper.

"When these views are stated with the apparent support of Lord Milner, and the cabinet neither confirms nor denies them, how can we expect manufacturers, traders, and shipowners to make any settled plans for the future?"

Premier Hughes quoted Herr Zimmermann's speech during the war, which said England's open-door policy permitted Germany's commercial expansion. Zimmermann's words were:

"We are sojourners in England's house, paying guests of the Anglo-Saxons.

"The secret of our success lies apart from our organization and the training of our working classes to the fact that England and the countries which are the great producers of raw materials granted us an open door, allowing us to draw upon their vast reservoirs of raw materials. If this permission is withdrawn we shall be at one stroke once more the Germany of 1880.

GERMAN GIVES VIEWS.

"Our dependence on the Anglo-Saxon was so great that it is no exaggeration to say that our system of protection was only possible because the Anglo-Saxon put at our disposal their fields of cheap production across the sea. But they did more.

"They gave admission to our merchants, trade agents, commercial establishments everywhere in their broad domains, looked kindly on them as long as they were modest, and thereby they assisted materially to open markets for our industrial products."

That's what Hughes wants changed. He wants it fixed so that there will be no more of that kind of thing which permitted Germany to control products vital to warfare. So Hughes asks:

"Are the self-governing dominions to be bound to Britain and to each other by ties of blood and traditions only, or are we to have a great imperial partnership in which the national and economic interests of each are conserved?

"Are we to have a policy of Britain for the British, Canada for the Canadians, Australia for the Australians, and the Empire for us all; forming a league of nations ourselves as well as being part of that greater league of nations, or are we to go back to things as they were before the war, a policy of negation, a policy of Britain and the Empire for the Germans, a policy dictated by Germany or by international finance?"

Mr. SHERMAN. What the labor conference will take up nobody can tell. There is a strike in Dublin among the grave-diggers. They have halted all the hearses. Nobody can be lawfully buried within a given area in Ireland at this time. I read just a short time ago, too, that the labor unions would take up a revision of the boxing code. Of course, everybody that goes into the ropes, the trained gladiator of the sawdust circle, is a laborer. They ought to form a union—the grand international union of physical sluggers—and here is a proposition to take them in and to devote the sober time of this international labor conference, I presume, to settling various international questions of where and how to hit an antagonist. Of course, the practical suggestions, as usual in all these labor conferences, come from England. Notwithstanding she is not carrying the world's championship among the subjects of George V at this time, she is always present with advice when anything is to be done, whether it is a grave-diggers' strike in Dublin or the proper knockout blow to be administered under the Marquis of Queensberry rules. It goes on to say:

"The root of many dangers and dissensions will have been extirpated," says a leading English critic, "when the three chief pugilistic countries—

You notice the honorary mention we receive at the hands of this distinguished authority—

Great Britain, America, and France—have accepted an international code of rules and a standard scale of weights."

The distinction between heavyweights and featherweights, between the heavy, slugging pugilists and those of a lighter and more agile form, will be reduced to a scientific basis. The article continues:

The Fédération Française de Boxe is calling a meeting of international representatives for next year to discuss the anomalies that exist all over the boxing world.

This came from Paris, of course. Great fistic events have been conducted there on divers occasions. The article continues:

If Great Britain and America could agree upon a common code (it would have to be arranged, of course, on the do ut des principle) the standard of boxing in both countries would be appreciably raised and the "regrettable incidents" which have caused so much trouble and provided captious critics with ammunition could no longer occur.

In America referees allow many things which are forbidden under National Sporting Club rules, with the result that the American boxer who comes over here is necessarily handicapped (for the boxer has to learn how to do what he does instinctively) and is apt to feel aggrieved when he loses the decision by a narrow margin.

Now it lapses into purely technical expressions:

The kidney punch, hitting with the open glove, and the "occipital" or "rabbit" punch are all allowed in America, and American boxing would be all the better if these dangerous and unsportsmanlike tricks were forbidden.

So we will come in for disciplining at the hands of the conference for everything. Possibly they see some way to obtain the championship belt by diplomacy rather than by scientific hitting. Great Britain is the greatest diplomatic country in the world, and possibly she, now that the war is over, has turned her attention to this highly important subject, so that we shall no longer obtain this honor in the sporting world.

I wish to insert the whole of this article on the boxing code without reading; also the article in reference to the gravediggers' strike in Dublin and elsewhere; also the report of the proposed barring of votes from the international conference if we do not get in early.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

BOXING CODE URGED FOR THREE NATIONS—INTERNATIONAL STANDARD WOULD KILL MANY ABUSES, BRITISH CRITICS CLAIM.

Suggestion comes from England that the three principal countries in which the sport of boxing is practiced—America, Great Britain, and France—should adopt an international code of rules and a standard scale of weights. It is contended that such a code and standard would obviate many abuses that occasionally creep into the sport and give its enemies something to talk about. British critics contend that there is altogether too much fouling in the ring, and they also deplore the attitude of fight crowds that persistently clamor for rough work and care nothing for the scientific aspect of boxing.

"The root of many dangers and dissensions will have been extirpated," says a leading English critic, "when the three chief pugilistic countries—Great Britain, America, and France—have accepted an international code of rules and a standard scale of weights. The Fédération Française de Boxe is calling a meeting of international representatives for next year to discuss the anomalies that exist all over the boxing world. If Great Britain and America could agree upon a common code (it would have to be arranged, of course, on the do ut des principle) the standard of boxing in both countries would be appreciably raised and the 'regrettable incidents' which have caused so much trouble and provided captious critics with ammunition could no longer occur.

"In America referees allow many things which are forbidden under National Sporting Club rules, with the result that the American boxer who comes over here is necessarily handicapped (for the boxer has to learn how to do what he does instinctively) and is apt to feel aggrieved when he loses the decision by a narrow margin. The kidney punch, hitting with the open glove, and the 'occipital' or 'rabbit' punch are all allowed in America, and American boxing would be all the better if these dangerous and unsportsmanlike tricks were forbidden.

"As regards infighting, on the other hand, the practice of American referees has struck me as more in accordance with common sense than that of some of ours, who are always pulling up the men engaged at close quarters for quite imaginary offenses against the spirit of the game. The result is that our young champions in the making are apt to pay too little attention to inside work, and, being single-plane fighters for the most part, are at a disadvantage when they meet the American, who fights in both planes—distributing his attack between the body and the head, the former for choice, which is the basis of a scientific all-round style.

"It ought not to be impossible to agree on a common code, provided, of course, we do not pose as having a monopoly of the quality of sportsmanship. There is really no reason in the nature of things why men should not box, as they play cricket, under the same rules all the world over."

GRAVEDIGGERS IN DUBLIN ALSO RESORT TO STRIKE—HAVE APPEALED TO HEARSE DRIVERS, WHO NOW REFUSE TO CONVEY BODIES FOR BURIAL.

DUBLIN, September 10.

A strike of gravediggers in Dublin, maintained for some weeks at Glasnevin Cemetery, has caused much inconvenience and some risk to the public health. It was mitigated, however, by the decision of the cemeteries committee to permit interments by people having plots in the cemetery provided that they opened and closed the graves themselves without calling on the committee for assistance.

The gravediggers have now appealed to the hearse drivers, who have declared a sympathetic strike and refuse to convey bodies for burial.

WOULD BAR VOTES OF NATIONS FAILING TO SEND DELEGATE—INTERNATIONAL LABOR CONFERENCE GROUP DISSATISFIED WITH REPRESENTATION—ISSUE BLOCKS PROGRAM PLANNED FOR TO-MORROW—EIGHT-HOUR DAY AND FORTY-EIGHT HOUR WEEK WAS TO HAVE BEEN TOPIC.

The labor group in the International Labor Conference is dissatisfied with the present basis of representation. An effort to throw out the votes of all countries which have not sent worker delegates and are represented only by governmental appointees will be made by the labor group in to-morrow's assembly. Decision to take this action was reached at a special meeting late to-day by the labor men.

Provisions in the peace treaty, under which the conference is held, are considered essentially responsible for the grievance over representation. These provisions allotted each country two Government delegates, one employer and one labor delegate.

When the International Federation of Trade Unions met at Amsterdam some time ago the demand was made that the Government delegation in each instance be reduced to one person. The question was to have been brought up at once when the federation met in Washington last Monday, but the meeting was postponed until the German and Austrian delegates arrived.

DISAGREE ON PROCEDURE.

The raising of this issue blocked the program of the conference to take up Monday the question of an 8-hour day and 48-hour week. The commission of selection, which is the conference steering committee, was unable to agree on procedure to handle the problems, and the entire matter probably will come before the conference this week. Some delegates favored referring the question of representation to a committee to prepare a plan for reorganization of the conference.

Labor delegates sought this delay in the program for the further purpose of preventing action prior to the arrival of the Germans and Austrians, it was said, as they are expected to be almost solidly in sympathy with the workers. By eliminating the votes of governmental delegates from countries without labor representation, and through the support of the governmental appointees of Germany, Austria, and other countries believed to side with labor as against capital, the labor group leaders hope, it was said, to create a block strong enough to prevent the conference from taking any action unfavorable to it. A two-thirds vote is required on all conclusions of the conference.

WOULD TAKE PART OF WORKERS.

The Government delegates of Czechoslovakia, and probably of Holland and Belgium, would take the part of the workers on all issues included in the agenda of the conference, one foreign delegate said.

The German and Austrian delegates sailed from Amsterdam on October 24, and should be here by Wednesday, according to W. A. Appleton, of England, president of the International Federation of Trade-Unions. It was frankly admitted that their presence might produce an awkward situation.

The 11 men from each of the two Central Powers will be placed on a quasi-diplomatic status, it was said, and may be housed in the old German Embassy, which now flies the Swiss flag. They could take their seats at the conference in alphabetical order, in accordance with recent seating arrangements.

The conference hall was given an international aspect by identifying each country's place at the long tables with the flag of that nation, but the German and Austrian designs will be excluded, due to legislation prohibiting the display of enemy colors.

ADMISSION OF NATIONS.

The commission on selection yesterday named a committee on the admission of new countries, which will have to take up the question of Finland and Mexico. Its members are: Government, Arthur Fontaine, France, and Newton W. Rowell, Canada; employers, Mr. Collinet, France, and Marcel Fraipont, Belgium; labor, Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor (N. M. Joshi, of India, will act in his stead until the United States is represented officially), and Gino Baldesi, of Italy.

The following committee on standing orders was named: Government, Count de Eza, Spain; M. Kershaw, India; E. Mahaim, Belgium. Employers, Mr. Goineau, France; Dr. Miall, Great Britain; Mr. Verkade, Holland. Labor, Conrad Ilg, Switzerland; Mr. Tayerle, Czechoslovakia; and P. M. Draper, Canada.

At the request of the labor delegates the question of a universal eight-hour day will be deferred to-morrow by the international labor conference.

Representatives of labor at a meeting yesterday evening decided they were not yet ready to begin the debate on the eight-hour day, as they desire to hold informal conferences with capital delegates. They so reported to the steering committee, which agreed to recommend the postponement.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is said [reading]:

Italian labor conferees represent 1,300,000 men. Gino Baldesi describes conditions among workmen of his people.

"Trade-unions in Italy were born of the political socialist movement," Mr. Baldesi explains. "It is only natural that the men who directed and still direct the trade-union movements should belong to the Socialist Party, even if they do not wholly approve the methods of action practiced by that body."

He is here and is now engaged in giving us wholesome advice. By the time this gentleman will have finished his sojourn in our midst and the offering of much advice on how to settle our troubles, no doubt the men out on a strike in the bituminous coal region will feel greatly encouraged. They will be convinced of the justice of their claims and encouraged in a persevering, obstinate struggle with the Government in its attempt to produce enough fuel to keep people from starving and freezing during the ensuing winter. I also wish to incorporate in the RECORD this news report from the Washington Star of the Italian labor conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The article referred to is as follows:

ITALIAN LABOR CONFEREE REPRESENTS 1,300,000 MEN—GINO BALDESI DESCRIBES CONDITIONS AMONG WORKMEN OF HIS PEOPLE—WAGES RISE 100 PER CENT SINCE WAR.

The International Labor Conference fairly bristles with distinctive personalities. Observers at the sittings frequently during the last week have found their attention sharply arrested by the vehement speeches of a member of the Italian delegation, delivered in his native tongue and ably and speedily translated into English by an elderly woman interpreter with a slightly Scottish accent who sits with the group from Italy.

The vigorous speaker is Gino Baldesi, vice secretary general of the Italian Confederation of Labor, and a leader of the socialists among wage earners. He is of medium height, is smooth shaven, has a high forehead and hair of a slightly reddish tinge, and appears to be in his early thirties. His acquaintance is international.

So soon as the labor conference here adjourns Mr. Baldesi will hold several meetings with Italian societies in the larger eastern cities, including Washington, and then will tour a part of the United States, delivering lectures under the auspices of the "Federazione Socialistica Italiana." He represents in his own country an organization of 1,300,000 workingmen, whose slogan is "nobody idle."

ITALIAN LABOR IS TOPIC.

Mr. Baldesi described during the course of an interview last evening the present condition and current activities of Italian labor people:

"The condition of Italian workmen to-day is greatly improved, thanks to our confederation, which has a membership of 1,300,000. Wages have risen 100 to 150 per cent above prewar rates, and as a result of the recent strike of metal workers (which lasted 60 days) these wages have been consolidated by fixing a minimum rate transforming the former earnings, which consisted of payment by the hour, by piecework, and in a bonus for the high cost of living, into a fixed rate as so much an hour, increased by a percentage in the case of those workers who do not work by the piece.

"This great strike, the importance of which was not made known in foreign countries, kept 250,000 workmen idle at a time when 100,000 workers in other industries were having industrial disputes with their employers.

"All workers in the steel and engineering trades now have the eight-hour day, secured last February. Steel workers have a weekly day of rest, and to make this possible relief shifts are employed. After the steel people won their eight-hour-day fight the same length workday was obtained by textile workers, printers, men engaged in building industries, and agricultural workers."

COMMITTEES ASSERT INFLUENCE.

"The workers' shop committees have asserted their influence in a notable way," he declared. "They have secured positive results which entitle us to hope much in the future. All individual or partly collective disputes are settled by agreement between the shop committee and the employer. Our workers have clearly shown that they understand not only their own special work, but the working of the industry as a whole, more especially with regard to the greater yield obtained as a result of certain methods which secure to pieceworkers the highest earnings."

In Italy there is now a strong organization of agricultural laborers led by a woman, Signora Argentina Altobelli. It has half a million members and with it is affiliated all other classes of workers, including clerks in stores and shops.

"Trade-unions in Italy were born of the political socialist movement," Mr. Baldesi explained. "It is only natural that the men who directed and still direct the trade-union movement should belong to the Socialist Party, even if they do not wholly approve the methods of action practiced by that party.

"Our unions are open to all on presentation of a statement of the trade to which they belong, and without obligations on their part to join any political party. If the majority of our members were of any other party than the Socialist, that majority could change the policy of the confederation of labor."

Mr. SHERMAN. There is another point to be noticed. It is not directly connected with the treaty, but it is entirely proper to comment on it, while they are advising us on everything from digging graves to boxing. It is our behavior in entertaining royalty. We are the butt of ridicule for the civilized world. Here is a report published in a newspaper in the capital of this Republic. When Punch in London will, with its celebrated artists, properly illustrate it they will have a star edition of the great British jester. It is the comic paper, running from before the days of the Civil War. It has apologized sometimes through its managers, but it has been a comic paper in England for many years without missing an issue. It even extracted comedy from the aircraft bombardment of the metropolis of the world. I read it during the war. It is well calculated, if a person could extract any comedy from tragedy, to do so. So I do not for a moment hesitate to refer to it in soberly arguing the international labor articles of the treaty. But we are told, in an article dated November 1 at New York, by Herbert Corey, and found in various papers in the United States, that when the King and Queen arrive at their own fireside for reflection they have a giggle coming. It goes on at some length to say that we have shown ourselves to be raw, uncouth, crude, without knowledge of social etiquette, and especially that we do not know how to treat crowned heads.

It is because we have so few of them coming to our shores and none of our own. I remember when the German Prince was sojourning here some years ago that the most vivid recollection I have is a large bill for damages that the State of Illinois had to pay, because during the blare of trumpets and the general martial uproar that prevailed several citizens fell off or were run over by the Illinois National Guard's horses and severely hurt, one of them maimed for life. He promptly filed claims against the State and was allowed a substantial sum. So, if we do not know how to entertain royalty, we know at least how to pay their bills.

I have an idea that when this thing gets into the Appropriations Committee it will be found that most of the sojourning representatives of royalty on our shores are coming here to hasten the final payments upon loans which have been promised by the Executive to be made. While the President of Liberia was here he closed up the last installment of a promised loan, and I apprehend the President of that Republic will be no more out of fashion than the rest of them. By the time we get it all there will be a series of closed-up loans, and with a rapidly narrowing market because of trade restrictions; by the time we loan them more money, and lose the rest of our trade, we will be in a condition where we may begin to look out for America.

James Bryce, former ambassador to this country from the United Kingdom, is not satisfied. Mr. Bryce wrote quite a critical article only a few days ago dated at London. He says that this whole treaty has in it the seeds of future commotion. He says that open diplomacy, of which so much has been said, is yet far away and declared that if they had not been too much occupied at home the English people would not have allowed so much to be kept from them. The article continues:

Lord Bryce said he thought the conference committed some very grave errors and was in grave danger of committing others.

He goes on to give in detail what he thinks some of the vital mistakes are and is not at all optimistic as to the future abolition of war so confidently promised by the league and the treaty. I ask to have this printed, Mr. President, without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

BRYCE ASSAILS PEACE COUNCIL—NATIONALITY AND OPEN DIPLOMACY IGNORED, HE ASSERTS.

LONDON, October 31.

Lord Bryce, commenting on the work of the peace conference, says that the principle of nationality proclaimed in President Wilson's 14 points was accepted in all belligerent countries and was the basis of the armistice, but that it had not been followed out in the peace conference. He declared that, although the conference had been sitting since last January, not much had been heard about its proceedings.

The veteran British diplomat remarked they had not yet arrived at that "open diplomacy" of which so much had been said, and declared that if they had not been too much occupied at home the English people would not have allowed so much to have been kept from them.

Lord Bryce said he thought the conference had committed some very grave errors and was in grave danger of committing others. Under the treaty signed with the little bit of Austria which remained he said 280,000 Tyrolese were taken and handed over to Italy. He said he had searched in vain for the reason for this action, but could find none, although it was totally opposed to the doctrine of nationality. The Italian Government said it wanted the Tyrolese territory for strategic purposes, Bryce said, but he declared they could not want it for that purpose against a practically bankrupt State of only 6,000,000 persons.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also ask to have the article from the Washington Star, by Mr. Corey, on the course that America takes in entertaining royalty, printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

AMERICA TAKES COURSE IN ENTERTAINING ROYALTY—WHEN KING AND QUEEN ARRIVE AT OWN FIRESIDE FOR REFLECTION THEY HAVE "GIGGLE" COMING.

NEW YORK, November 1.

When King Albert of Belgium and Queen Elizabeth get back home—and get the soreness soaked out of their poor feet—and pull on nightcaps at night instead of wearing crowns—and sit around the royal fireside with their collars unbuttoned, it is fairly certain they will lift weary eyes to weary eyes; and then they'll giggle. Not a hearty laugh, if you get me; true royalty isn't laughing at the untamed yeomanry this year. But there is undoubtedly a giggle coming.

"We Americans," said an observer, "haven't yet learned how to handle kings and queens."

We are doing well, at that. The observer said that some of our ladies courtesied so low to Albert and his queen that the bursting of corset strings sounded like the abrupt deflating of rear tires. And there were a few fat ladies who achieved the ultimate in the way of sinking before majesty, but could not get back to an upright position without assistance. That more or less impaired the spectacle. And the observer said that the sight of a sturdy democrat meeting socially the first honest-to-goodness king that ever visited our shores was invariably inspiring.

WOULD TAKE KING'S HAND.

"The sturdy democrat," said he, "would take the king's hand, and then he would not know what to do with it. Not being brought up to the etiquette of courts, he never knew whether he or the king was supposed to let go first. And he always smiled warmly at the king, but rarely initiated any conversation. Nor did the king, because his English is not exactly ardent. By and by, Brand Whitlock, or one of the other hands attending royalty, would pry the democrat loose and he would move on. And another would take his place, smiling warmly, but also speechless."

It was when the king and queen visited the Grand Canyon of Arizona, the observer said, that the tendency of the American courtier to adhere to the beaten paths of conversation became most appallingly apparent. The governor of Arizona, he said, entered the private car of the king and queen at 7 o'clock that morning, when the car crossed the Arizona line, and stayed with them to the New Mexico line, where a New Mexican escort took up the darling task of keeping the king and queen all buoyed up. Of course, royalty was shown the Grand Canyon, and after the showing the governor of Arizona and others introduced various persons of eminence to the titled guests.

"Brand Whitlock always told 'em," said the observer, "that both the royal Belgians can talk English—though the queen talks the more reliable brand. So each new initiate seized a monarchial hand and with every confidence that he was entering an untried field of talk, asked:

"'What do you think of the Grand Canyon?'"

It was at Flagstaff, Ariz., that Albuquerque, N. Mex., got what was coming to her. Jimmy Swinnerton and other highbinders of the great dust heard that Albuquerque designed entertaining the guests with some Indian dances. Indian dancing is considered by Flagstaff a peculiarly Arizonian enterprise. So Jimmy Swinnerton and associates sent flivvers into the desert and captured every loose Indian.

No attention was paid to consideration of age, sex, rank, or condition. They were ruthlessly dragged down to Flagstaff, stripped down to dancing costume, and set a-dancing. For two hours they capered and yoohooed in front of the hotel, while the king and queen sat mournfully on the veranda and watched the performance.

"They gave every sort of dance from the Geronimo Jazz to the First of July Snake Dance," said the observer. "Indians danced before the king that hadn't lifted a leg in 30 years. The merciless Swinnerton lurked in the shadow urging them on."

KING GIVES HIS OPINION.

After the dance the king was asked by the observer what he thought of the dancing. He hesitated for a moment, seeming to choose his words with great care. Then he said:

"It—ah—seemed rather prolonged."

The next day the king and queen visited Albuquerque, N. Mex., said the observer, and the Albuquerquans put on an Indian dance to amuse them. They had heard of the pitiful efforts of the odious Swinnerton and his fallen associates and determined to give the king and queen a desert dance show they would never forget. The observer thinks they succeeded. The Albuquerque affair lasted four hours.

As is the custom of royalty, the king carries trunks full of orders and medals around him. One of the officers of his entourage is forever one foot behind him to the right, with his pockets full of every sort of decoration that Belgium turns out.

SAN FRANCISCO'S WELCOME.

At San Francisco the local 1,300 determined to give a nifty banquet in honor of the royal guests. Only they have never entertained any royalty in San Francisco since the visit of the late Queen Lil, who was currently reported to care more for a good dish of hooch than for any other form of amusement. So the making of ground rules was intrusted to some folk who had had experience with monarchs on their native heaths. They fixed up a grand mess.

"All the guests must face the king and queen at the banquet," said the rule makers. "No one may touch any course until the queen does. If she declines a course all must pass."

There were other rules, but these are enough. All went merry as a wedding bell until it was discovered that if every banqueter must face the queen there wasn't a dining room in the city big enough to seat more than 300. And if no one might take a course the queen declined there were fears that the guests would bring pockets full of popcorn, for by this time the queen was eating only crackers and milk.

SOCIAL ARBITERS QUIT.

"So the social arbiters quit," said the observer, "and the bars were thrown down and any sort of a hit went for three bases. About 2,000 people were present and they sat on the queen's lap and every one had a grand, uproarious jubilee."

On approaching the East, after their tour of the West, the observer says the king, munching a handful of mint drops, had a conference with Brand Whitlock one morning, while the queen was opening a bottle of pepsin tablets. And later that day Whitlock sent a telegram to the caterer who was preparing the meal which was to grace the next formal function.

"For heaven's sake," the telegram read, or something like that, "give their majesties some plain food. They haven't eaten anything without truffles in it since they came out West!"

Mr. SHERMAN. It is no wonder an Englishman not long ago said that the United States was the fat boy of the world. We are, it seems, to be found always looking out for somebody else; either that or we are grossly overreached. We either do not know how to take care of ourselves or we are the most philanthropic knight-errant the world ever saw.

I now return, Mr. President, to these various articles referred to. At some length on last Friday I commented upon article 414. There is much in this subhead of the treaty, and the various articles following, to bear out article 414. It is there expressly recognized as the right of these nations to take any action of an economic character against a defaulting Government which they consider to be appropriate and which other Governments would be justified in adopting.

It follows in article 416 that in the event of any member failing to take the action required by article 405, which is, in substance, the entire code of procedure for the conference with regard to a recommendation or draft convention, any other member shall be entitled to refer the matter to the permanent court of international justice.

Anything that happens in the event we were a member of this international conference now sitting, any action taken which we did not feel at liberty to obey, could be referred to this authority, the permanent court of international justice, to be created under article 14 of the league of nations. These various small countries will be represented in the international labor conference just as they are in the league of nations. We may be outvoted.

On any of the various terms affecting our labor conditions the smaller nations of Europe and Asia, Central or South America, may join and vote upon us conditions totally inapplicable to our industrial state. Then, if we do not obey them, economic pressure can be applied.

While I have great confidence in the British Empire's sense of justice in war times or in great emergencies, I can not forget that even to-day she has navigation and trade laws with countries, and some of her own subject territories, at that, which are most unjust. There exist to-day in some quarters of the world some regulations that are as burdensome as the navigation laws of our colonial periods.

Great Britain, therefore, using the smaller nations, has voting power, and may thrust upon us unjust regulations, unjust to both the employee and the employer, in our domestic affairs. She may do this premeditatedly. She is noted for embarrassing the trade of her competitors. She may not abandon her free-trade course of former years. She need not to do so. She can obtain advantage of us, still preserving her traditional attitude on that economic question. She can, through the smaller nations, through the power that she will exert in her territorial dependencies, so embarrass us as to destroy our export trade, especially if she is given power in the international labor conference to work out such measures as are of an economic character, if we are held to be a defaulting Government.

In article 417 it is provided that—

The decision of the permanent court of international justice in regard to a complaint or matter which has been referred to it in pursuance of article 415 or article 416 shall be final.

There is no appeal from this save to the arbitrament of the sword. Couple this with article 418:

The permanent court of international justice may affirm, vary, or reverse any of the findings or recommendations of the commission of inquiry, if any, and shall in its decision indicate the measures, if any, of an economic character which it considers to be appropriate and which other Governments would be justified in adopting against a defaulting Government.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], in discussing that question last Friday afternoon, reminded the Senate of a regulation that might be made by Congress, declared valid by the Supreme Court of the United States, and declared inapplicable, or no longer to apply to us, by the international labor conference. He then propounded the inquiry, Whom would be obey, our own Supreme Court mandate or the international labor conference?

It is provided here that the finding of the permanent court of international justice shall be final, and in its last judgment on the question it may indicate in its order the character of the economic pressure which it considers appropriate to be applied to a defaulting Government. If that were applied to us let us examine for a moment what it would do, what would be the necessary consequence if the international court should enforce one of its orders against us for a failure to obey some finding of the international labor conference.

The Supreme Court might declare that the regulation was valid. It would be binding upon every citizen, official, and every State authority in the 48 States of the Union. It would be valid to all intents and purposes within our territorial limits. However, at some remote point in the world, Geneva, or some place in Baluchistan, the international labor conference shortly afterwards holds its meeting. They find that the rule we have adopted, and which the Supreme Court has held valid in our country, is not in accordance with international justice.

The angle at which the various nations of the world view it will be expressed by two-thirds majority. If two-thirds majority have been obtained, they will enact some other and different rule for the regulation of the same subject. Child labor is a good illustration. Child labor in the British East Indies or in any part of the warmer portion of Asia would require a vastly different standard from that of the northern Temperate Zone. The development of children, the age at which they reach maturity, is somewhat a question of latitude. Therefore, the rule that would be applicable in our country would be a too high age limit in the Tropics or in any of the warmer portions of central Asia. It would not apply to portions of northern Africa, any of the French possessions, Algiers, or Egypt, or of the various countries where there is an earlier maturity of childhood.

Therefore the conference may arrive at some different conclusion and impose some other international rule upon us, a different law than that we had provided for our own domestic affairs. Of course, they can not enforce it unless by war. That is a matter for us to decide to suit ourselves. But under these provisions economic retaliation is the weapon expressly provided. In the covenant of the league of nations one of the articles empowers the instruments of that league to create a permanent court of international justice. Evidently the men who framed these various articles knew what they were doing. They had a very comprehensive view of the entire mechanism, and it fits accurately one part to another.

The permanent court of international justice referred to in articles 416, 417, and 418 is the same tribunal the creation of which is provided for in the covenant of the league of nations. Their decree, therefore, binds all the appropriate measures of economic retaliation the governments would be justified in adopting against any defaulting government. Article 419 goes still further:

In the event of any member failing to carry out within the time specified the recommendations, if any, contained in the report of the commission of enquiry, or in the decision of the permanent court of international justice, as the case may be, any other member may take against that member the measures of an economic character indicated in the report of the commission or in the decision of the court as appropriate to the case.

So it is not only the joint action of all the members taking part in the conference, but any one of them may, on its own initiative, undertake to enforce economic retaliation against us. It may make burdensome port regulations, it may put on discriminative duties, it may lay an embargo upon the principal articles we export to their market, it may take any measure that, in the discretion of its government, it sees fit to adopt, and we are helpless as against one of the members of the international conference or against all of them acting jointly against us.

Mr. President, I can not conclude my comments this evening. There are several sections yet; and, if it is agreeable to the Senate, I would prefer to conclude at some other time.

[At this point Mr. SHERMAN yielded the floor for the day.]

Tuesday, November 4 (legislative day of November 3), 1919.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I had not concluded on the amendment when the recess was taken last night. In the presentation of various parts of the chapter referred to I had not taken up all of the articles or paragraphs with the annex. I had reached in the discussion as far as article 419. It is provided there:

In the event of any member failing to carry out within the time specified the recommendations, if any, contained in the report of the commission of enquiry, or in the decision of the permanent court of international justice, as the case may be, any other member may take against that member the measures of an economic character indicated in the report of the commission or in the decision of the court as appropriate to the case.

This leaves to any member a discretionary right to insist upon retaliatory economic measures to be applied to any country that is held to be in default. This article is immediately followed by article 420, which reads:

The defaulting Government may at any time inform the governing body that it has taken the steps necessary to comply with the recommendations of the commission of enquiry or with those in the decision of the permanent court of international justice, as the case may be, and may request it to apply to the secretary-general of the league to constitute a commission of enquiry to verify its contention. In this case the provisions of articles 412, 413, 414, 415, 417, and 418 shall apply, and if the report of the commission of enquiry or the decision of the permanent court of international justice is in favour of the defaulting Government, the other Governments shall forthwith discontinue the measures of an economic character that they have taken against the defaulting Government.

This article is followed by Chapter III, which immediately fits in with the preceding articles quoted. Article 421 provides:

The members engage to apply conventions which they have ratified in accordance with the provisions of this part of the present treaty to their colonies, protectorates, and possessions which are not fully self-governing.

Great Britain, the largest holder of colonial possessions in the world, could apply any of these provisions to Jamaica, in part, and to any of her West India possessions in the Caribbean Basin. Conditions in her colonies in the West Indies might make them competitive with countries in Central America. The other day I referred to the banana market as being supplied principally by two countries in the world, namely, Costa Rica and Jamaica. The labor conditions in Jamaica might be intimately connected with labor conditions in Costa Rica. Costa Rica is an independent Government.

It furnishes, roughly speaking, about two-thirds of this well-known fruit to the market. The other third is furnished by Jamaica. Under the provisions of the treaty as to the international labor conference, the details of the production of this article might be so regulated or fixed as to give Jamaica the advantage in the market. Jamaica is a British-governed island; the laws and the regulations of Great Britain in labor matters would apply to Jamaica equally as to other parts of British colonial possessions; more so than they would in New Zealand or Australia, because the latter are, in all local affairs, purely self-governing and independent, whereas Great Britain, through acts of Parliament and by administrative officers appointed in England, governs such conditions in Jamaica. They could in a labor conference, therefore, adopt regulations which would seriously hamper Costa Rica or any other Central American country. The conditions are of such a character that they can be applied to parts of any partially self-governing province. They would apply particularly to a large number of the colonial possessions of Great Britain outside of the five that are made sovereign powers in the league. The exceptions provided in article 421 are:

(1) Except where owing to the local conditions the convention is inapplicable; or

(2) Subject to such modifications as may be necessary to adapt the convention to local conditions.

And each of the members shall notify to the international labour office the action taken in respect of each of its colonies, protectorates, and possessions which are not fully self-governing.

Article 422 relates to the majority required to adopt amendments to the labor provisions of the present treaty, requiring a two-thirds vote "cast by the delegates present," to "take effect when ratified by the States whose representatives compose the council of the league of nations and by three-fourths of the members." Article 422 has been referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I do not think he overrates the significance of this article. I quote it again, because it will be of far-reaching significance in the event of the adoption without amendment of the league and the treaty.

Article 423 provides:

Any question or dispute relating to the interpretation of this part of the present treaty or of any subsequent convention concluded by the members in pursuance of the provisions of this part of the present treaty shall be referred for decision to the permanent court of international justice.

Here is a grant of jurisdiction to an alien tribunal. It provides that any dispute arising from the international labor conference shall be referred to the permanent court of international justice. The creation of that tribunal, how it shall function, and its jurisdiction are in general terms provided for in the so-called league covenant of the league of nations. Article 423 enlarges its jurisdiction and further permits it to have control of any disputes arising out of the international labor conference. It places any disputed matter that may be purely domestic to the United States within the power of a foreign tribunal. Matters relating to a disputed question growing out of our labor conditions are no longer to be regulated by Congress or by the legislatures of the several States; they will hereafter, as soon as a dispute shall have originated, be referred to an alien tribunal. The award or the decree of that tribunal when made will apply to this country because of the power of economic retaliation given in the preceding sections to which I referred yesterday. Without giving in direct terms the power to the alien body to regulate our affairs, because that would seem too open an invasion of the powers of Congress in local matters, it indirectly places us, in effect, within the power of this tribunal. For reasons indicated in commenting upon the preceding sections, it puts our entire foreign trade, our foreign travel, our financial communication, our sale of exchange, the collection of debts of our nationals owing them by any debtor of any other country entirely within the retaliatory power of the tribunal that passes on the dispute.

Such disputes may be initiated by any member of the international labor conference, or, in the event they arise in the conference itself, they may be referred by proper resolution of the conference to the tribunal for decision. So in either event, either by action of an individual nation or by the combined action of the nations represented in the conference, they may be referred to this tribunal, and article 423 gives them full power of decision.

There could not be a more disastrous invasion of the local problems which at the present time it is purely within our power to solve without interference by any foreign country. Here, however, we consent to such interference. We consent, in the event we do not retain the power of regulation of these domestic matters, to have economic retaliation visited upon us for our failure so to comply.

Following, in article 424, chapter 4, it is provided:

The first meeting of the conference shall take place in October, 1919. The place and agenda for this meeting shall be as specified in the annex hereto.

Arrangements for the convening and the organisation of the first meeting of the conference will be made by the Government designated for the purpose in the said annex. That Government shall be assisted in the preparation of the documents for submission to the conference by an international committee constituted as provided in the said annex.

In pursuance of these powers the representatives of the various countries concerned have sent their delegates. The treaty and the league covenant are not yet in force in our country; we have not yet ratified them; but we witness the convening of the labor conference in this country. It convenes here, as I intimated yesterday evening, not at an opportune time. We are in a sensitive, not to say a dangerously irritated, state, so far as our industrial affairs are affected; but, without waiting for any ratification of the treaty and league covenant, the delegates from the various countries that are eager to obtain the benefits of the stronger nations have sent their delegates here, and they have begun to function in this Capital. So far as I am concerned, they are an unwelcome body; I have no kindred feeling for the delegates that have thrust themselves upon this country. I regard them as impertinent intermeddlers, seeking to effect a lodgment here on local matters that are not wanted by the country where they are temporarily sojourning.

It provides in the latter paragraph:

The expenses of the first meeting and of all subsequent meetings held before the league of nations has been able to establish a general fund, other than the expenses of delegates and their advisers, will be borne by the members in accordance with the apportionment of the expenses of the International bureau of the Universal Postal Union.

And when it comes to meeting the expenses generally of the league or the treaty, the only limitations on the power of the league or the nations concerned, when they meet jointly, is in the maintenance of the secretariat and the payment of the expenses of the International Labor Conference. On all other expenses, notwithstanding the views at one time expressed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the apportionment is purely within the power of the several nations represented in the league. How it will be apportioned, we can very intelligently conjecture.

Some days ago I put in the RECORD a list of the private taxable wealth of the various countries of Europe compared with our own. It shows that our wealth is very largely in excess of that of any other country in the world. It is more than the total taxable private wealth of many of the countries combined. It is nearly twice that of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, and nearly three times that of the German Government, or the people living within the borders of that Government. It is nearly eight times that of some of the smaller powers engaged in the war. When it comes to paying the expenses, some light is shed on the methods by the enumeration, in the two cases I have given, of how the expenses shall be apportioned. They are, in the two cases only, limited by the method adopted in distributing the expenses of the international bureau of the Universal Postal Union. The enumeration in the two cases of how the expenses shall be apportioned excludes any limitation upon all the other expenses, under the well-known rule of interpretation that where the method is enumerated in certain instances, and all of the others are not enumerated, that leaves it open to the generally granted discretionary powers of the league. Therefore we are very likely to pay from two to five times or eight times as much as any other country in the world of these expenses. The only place where there is a definite limitation is in the two instances mentioned, the International Labor Conference and the expenses of the secretariat, which is a permanent organization, the office and the departments of which will be found at Geneva upon the beginning of the actual organization of the league.

In article 425 it is provided:

Until the league of nations has been constituted all communications which under the provisions of the foregoing articles should be addressed to the secretary general of the league will be preserved by the director of the international labor office, who will transmit them to the secretary general of the league.

So that the actions taken by the International Labor Conference in Washington in October and November of this year will be preserved by the proper authority, and in due time transmitted to Sir Eric Drummond. He will be the custodian from the time he receives them until other arrangements have been made. This, therefore, puts in the hands of a citizen of Great Britain all of the detailed knowledge of the proceedings of this conference held in Washington. Whether we will be able to obtain it, in the event it becomes interesting to any of our domestic affairs, we are unable to say. We can only know that in attempting to obtain the records of the deliberations leading to the formation of the league and the treaty we were unable to obtain a single page. We know the value that it might have in the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, or in this Chamber, in the interpretation of the various articles and phrases in this document; and still we have wholly failed to receive any of the records that might so enlighten us.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I asked him if he has inserted in the RECORD, or stated anywhere, what are the methods of distributing expenses by the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I have not put those in the RECORD. They can be readily obtained, and I should be glad if some Senator would place them in the RECORD in connection with the discussion of the labor provisions of the treaty.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have been curious to know, but have not yet taken the time to find out, what the method is that is employed by the Universal Postal Union.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would not undertake to give them, Mr. President. I have read them only since the discussion under the treaty began. It is provided there that the various nations that are members of the Universal Postal Union shall contribute in certain ratios to the expenses, but I would not undertake to give the matter from memory. I will find the provisions if no other Senator does, and have them inserted at length. I think that in view of our discussion upon both sides here and in the maintenance of the secretariat the whole of the regulations ought to be preserved where they are more readily accessible. They can be had by referring to the Research Department of the Congressional Library.

If we are no more successful in obtaining the records of this meeting, which might, in the event we ratify the league and treaty, become material to us, than we have been in former cases, we would proceed in total ignorance, except as it might be given to the public press.

In article 426 it is provided:

Pending the creation of a permanent court of international justice, disputes which in accordance with this part of the present treaty would be submitted to it for decision will be referred to a tribunal of three persons appointed by the council of the league of nations.

Before the permanent court of international justice is created by the authority provided in the league, here is a temporary tribunal which may have access to these records which may be denied to us if the same rule is followed as in the peace conference at Paris, and in settling disputes they may act upon all matters that the permanent court of international justice could act upon. This temporary tribunal may last for a year. How long it will take to frame the permanent court of international justice no Senator can say. It might be purposely deferred. It furnishes the means for indefinite delay. If advantage would accrue to any of the controlling spirits of the league or of the international conference, this temporary tribunal could be made to last for several years.

The annex provides for the first meeting of the annual labor conference of 1919 at Washington. The Government of the United States is requested to convene the conference. That has not been officially done. It has not been possible officially so to do. The President issued a purely extra-official proclamation. He had no executive power, under any of the general constitutional powers vested in him, to issue such a proclamation. This International Labor Conference now in session at the Pan American Building in Washington therefore has no lawful status in this country. They are here as guests. They sojourn here merely as aliens. They possess no legal significance. Their findings are of no binding authority on this country. Their convening is purely voluntary. Any Executive order of the President lends no significance or authority to their presence in this Capital.

I refer to this matter to show the somewhat indecent and tumultuous haste with which some of the nations of the world are imbued in attempting to operate under the league of nations before it exists. Their precipitate haste ought to put us on our guard.

The international organizing committee—will consist of seven members, appointed by the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, and Switzerland. The committee may, if it thinks necessary, invite other members to appoint representatives.

The annex continues—

It provides for a program, or what would be called in a judicial tribunal in this country the agenda, the number of subjects or cases that are to be disposed of at that term or session. The agenda provided here sets out in detail the subjects that are to be considered:

(1) Application of principle of the 8-hour day or of the 48-hour week.
(2) Question of preventing or providing against unemployment.
(3) Women's employment:
(a) Before and after childbirth, including the question of maternity benefit.
(b) During the night.
(c) In unhealthy processes.
(4) Employment of children:
(a) Minimum age of employment.
(b) During the night.
(c) In unhealthy processes.

The fifth reads as follows:

(5) Extension and application of the international conventions adopted at Berne in 1906 on the prohibition of night work for women employed in industry and the prohibition of the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches.

These are all of the provisions of the annex. I wish to take these up and consider them briefly in reference to our domestic situation.

The 8-hour day and the 48-hour week are matters that are entirely within our own jurisdiction. By various private arrangements between employer and employee, through organized labor, in many instances, and where it has come within the police power of the State, the hours of labor for children, as well as for women, have been fixed either by agreement or legislation.

We can carry that further and provide by law, by States, or within the jurisdiction of Congress under the interstate-commerce clause, for eight hours in matters of national concern. These, however, are all questions of domestic jurisdiction.

Then there is the question of preventing or providing against unemployment. We have had our own unemployment periods here. What good can possibly come from the nations in this international league represented here intruding their advice upon a domestic unemployment condition? How will it be possible for some of the nations that join in the treaty, like Ecuador, Siam, Hejaz, Liberia, Peru, or Nicaragua, to give us advice upon the unemployment situation in our country? What sound reason is there that these nations should interfere in making regulations on an unemployment question? We have had our own bread lines and bread wagons in years past, and we have managed to go through the winter without advice from foreign sources. Why these matters should now be advised upon by the body sojourning here passes human understanding, from the American viewpoint.

Women's employment, relating to the various States and conditions of that employment, is to be considered. We have some of the most humane laws regulating the employment of women in the several States of the Union known to the industrial civilized world. Just what terms might be fixed by an international labor conference, even this one now in session here, is beyond conjecture. What these countries from the equatorial regions, or from the Orient, may regard as proper regulations we can not now say; but we are vitally interested in it. It is of the utmost concern to us that we preserve free from interference our right to regulate the employment of women inside the borders of the United States.

If, however, we claim this right and exercise it exclusively, we render ourselves liable at any time if we differ from recommendations made by the labor conference to industrial boycott that might very materially affect our prosperity. It makes no difference what the reasonableness or the unreasonableness of this provision might be from our angle. We no longer control it. We must either pay the penalty of not obeying, or obey and render ourselves unable to regulate our local conditions.

The employment of children is in a like condition. Child labor is a matter of vital concern, because the physical and mental condition of the succeeding generation is materially determined by regulations of that character. It is a matter peculiarly applicable to our own affairs. I know of no reason why this country should interfere to tell us the age at which boys or girls should begin to be breadwinners. At present in most of the northern or western industrial States the boy becomes an industrial adult at the age of 16 years. For all purposes he is able then to do a man's work. He is released from any regulations of the States, and is able from that time to work as he pleases, subject only to the general regulations applicable to all adults. Whether 16 would be a proper age in the judgment of an industrial conference of this character no one can say.

I have seen some of these delegates about the hotel and various public places in the last few days. I would not, for my part, feel like relegating our industrial regulations to those men. I can not speak their language, and from a general inspection of their aspect and a judgment of their character apparent from their contour and behavior, I do not feel like trusting my affairs or my country's affairs to their tender mercies. I can see only one visible effect so far from the conference. It illustrates the infinite number of varieties in which the human beard may be grown and trimmed. As a sanitary regulation, if I were to offer a resolution as a member of the international conference, it would be to eliminate several tons of whiskers from the visiting brethren as a first means toward procuring sanitary conditions of working in the countries from which they hail.

Still these gentlemen are sojourning here, and before long will be engaged in passing upon the industrial labor situation in our country and enforcing upon us resolutions of theirs, under pain of economic boycott.

We are in the humiliating condition now in which we are merely international hole stoppers for the world. We have no independence left. It is worthy of another Shakespeare to show the deterioration of American spirit, the total surrender of affairs, for proposing which a few years ago anyone in this Chamber would have been regarded as demented or so utterly lacking in patriotism that he ought to expatriate himself and go elsewhere.

We are able to take care of ourselves. We are able to produce the necessary food and other supplies. When necessary, we can produce an Army and Navy sufficient for our purposes. We do not require any guardianship. We need no conservator, either in peace or war. We are abundantly endowed for self-defense. If we would attend strictly to our own affairs, remain within our own borders, conserve our man power and our credit, instead of interesting ourselves, or attempting to do so, in the difficulties of every nation in the world, these delegates would not have the supreme self-assurance to come here and undertake such authority over us.

Outside of these matters, which are purely domestic, relating to child and woman labor, there are other matters that could be reached by this international labor conference that would seriously interfere with developments that are constantly taking place in our own country. I have always been disposed very favorably, in settling labor controversies, toward profit sharing. I believe it contains, under reasonable rules, much that will settle the frequent strikes that are troubling us from time to time. Profit sharing in our country is not only a curative process for these disturbances but it becomes a promotor of thrift. It is an ally of the savings bank. It would do a world of good in promoting a more general distribution of the profits of the various enterprises.

Profit sharing has taken various forms in our own country. Profits have been distributed according to the salary or wages paid the employees in the particular industry. They have been encouraged to invest their savings in shares of stock of various enterprises. I have in mind a very large mercantile concern in St. Louis in the hardware business. They make it a rule that every employee must have at least one share of stock in the company. They will furnish him the one or more shares of stock and give him time to pay for it, making it possible to everyone who enters their employ to become a part owner.

In others of the different enterprises a great many details are worked out. Mr. William C. Procter, in the American Magazine not long ago, gave a detailed plan of profit sharing with his employees. He is a member of the well-known firm of Procter & Gamble, engaged in the manufacture of soap.

These people have worked out a profit-sharing plan that gives general satisfaction. There is but little complaint ever heard from any of their employees. The profit sharing of this enterprise and others is peculiarly applicable to the Anglo-Saxon race. I am referring to this because the international labor conference have power to act upon this subject.

There are in this conference as constituted at the present time many socialist delegates. There is a number that go beyond even the limits of peaceful socialism. They are radicals. They need not necessarily come from some of the smaller countries. Great Britain has radicals within her borders. They abound in any one of the countries of the United Kingdom. The radicals present in this international labor conference are but a few degrees removed from those who advocate the plan to reduce all industrial life to a soviet basis. These radicals do not believe in the accumulations of the so-called bourgeoisie, the middle class in our country. They regard the middle class as their enemies. The great body of the people in the United States in moderate circumstances, those who own their own business or have a small income, either upon their savings or upon some occupation, are regarded as the social enemies of all who believe in the soviet form of government, and especially the plan of taking over industries by this plan.

So the hostility to profit sharing can at any time be brought to a head by the radicals in these conferences. I have been observing their conduct, so far as the press gives such reports, to find out whether any such spirit will develop. While no signs are manifest up to this time, nobody can tell when some radical or socialist who believes in the State assuming ownership and operation of the various industrial enterprises will rise and propose some such measure.

None of these radical delegates favor profit sharing. Whatever may be our domestic system of development in that branch of our industrial disputes and the settlement supplied, the national labor conference may destroy, by a single resolution, all of the developments in our own country out of which much good, I believe, has come. If we do not obey whatever recommendation comes from the conference, and if a majority of the commission of inquiry report and the permanent court of international justice approved upon an appeal and a hearing, we are liable to this economic discrimination to compel us to comply with the orders of the conference.

This is a particularly dangerous place for the conference to interfere. Our own developments along this line have built up some of the most prosperous concerns in the country. Some of them have not had a strike in more than 25 years, since the initiation of this plan. It is a method of democratizing an industry that has in it much practical good. It is democratizing of an industry that does not appeal to Government ownership or the instincts of confiscation. It does not appeal to the soviet or any similar method of taking something for nothing. It leaves us to work out, by peaceful details and under the rules of economic processes, our own solution of the problem. I believe this method that has developed so much good in our country is in danger of destruction at the hands of international labor conferences of the kind now held here.

Mr. President, I wish to ask that the plan presented and in actual operation at Cincinnati and various other plants of the Procter & Gamble Co., presented by Mr. William C. Procter, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without reading. I have quoted somewhat from it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, that may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

YOU ARE CONCERNED IN THIS, WHETHER EMPLOYER OR EMPLOYEE.

"Almost every important business in the country is studying some form of profit sharing. It is a subject of great interest just at this time. No matter whether you employ others or work for others—you are involved.

"For over 30 years the Procter & Gamble Co. has successfully carried on a profit-sharing plan. So we asked William Cooper Procter, the president of the corporation, to tell exactly what his company does.

"Here is his article. It is full of surprising facts—both as to the amount of money some employees make and the extent of their participation in the conduct of the business.

"THE EDITOR."

PROFIT SHARING—HOW WE DIVIDE WITH OUR MEN.

(By William Cooper Procter, president of the Procter & Gamble Co.)

"'Is your firm afraid of Bolshevism among its employees?' a friend asked me the other day.

"'No,' I answered, 'not at all.'

"The question sent a series of pictures flashing through my mind. One of these, which would have been far more effective than my denial, throws an interesting light on the mental attitude that 33 years of profit sharing have given our workmen.

"In February, 1918, we told the employees' conference committee, our men's parliament, that we were going to give them the eight-hour working day as soon as possible. 'War demands are so heavy,' we explained, 'that the 10 and 11 hour day must be continued for the present, although we recognize the 8-hour day as a base, and we'll pay you time and a half for all overtime.'

"Two months after the signing of the armistice we were able to announce that we would go ahead to the standard eight-hour day and would stop the overtime work.

"'You are going to make considerably less money,' I said to the men, 'unless your wages are raised. I want you to call meetings in all the departments and thrash this out. Decide what wages you think you ought to receive if the eight-hour day goes into effect and report your decision in 10 days.'

"In each of the 35 departments at Ivorydale—our Cincinnati plant—the workers got together and talked out the situation. They then compared results at a general meeting of the conference committee. Promptly at the end of 10 days the decision of the general meeting was brought back in the shape of a report—a report which shows there is no breeding ground for Bolshevist bacilli at the Ivorydale plant.

"'We want the eight-hour day,' the report ran, 'but it is our unanimous decision that we don't want to say what you shall pay us. You know as well as we that the cost of living has gone up, and you'll take that into account. You have always treated us right, and we know you are going to keep on doing it.'

"Soon after we received this report the company was able to announce a new scale of wages, under which the lowest paid able-bodied man in the plant would get 50 cents an hour and the average worker would receive as much for 8 hours' work as 10 hours had been bringing him before. I was pleased to learn later that this scale was above that set by any department in their informal discussions.

"Our employees have been called 'working capitalists.'

"Perhaps the title is not too far afield. But to me it is of more significance to know that they are contented and happy.

"Many of our innovations were born more of the earnest desire to foster this spirit of content and to give our workers freer opportunity to express themselves than of the mere wish to improve their finances.

"The employees' conference plan was, I believe, the first move of its kind in business history. Certainly it was one of the first. Together with the profit sharing, group insurance, and pension and benefit plans, it is simply in line with our conception of the square deal.

"Early last year we worked out the idea of having the employees elect by secret ballot a conference committee to meet monthly with the management, in order to bring to our attention matters that seemed to need correction or to make any suggestions for the general betterment. Each department with not more than 50 workers chooses a representative, and there is one representative for every 50 persons in the larger departments.

"Up to the present no suggestion by the employees—and they have made many—has been turned down unless we were able to show them that it was impracticable. I always feel that if I talk with our men and can not convince them that they are wrong the chances are they are right.

"Business men know that wages are higher and working conditions better in a large manufacturing plant than in a small one. Yet the men in the smaller plant—working longer hours, paid less, and not so well looked after—are usually more contented. The reason lies largely in the fact that men feel a more intimate personal interest in the smaller organization, and therefore a greater loyalty to it.

"The chief problem of 'big business' to-day is to shape its policies so that each worker, whether in office or factory, will feel he is a vital part of his company, with a personal responsibility for its success, and a chance to share in that success. To bring this about, an employer must take the men into his confidence. They should know why they are doing things, the relation of their work to other departments, and, so far as practicable, to the business as a whole; they should be told those elements of cost of production affected by their work, or they can not put intelligent effort into what they are doing. What is more, I believe that the workman should have some means through which he can give expression to his ideas as to the general policy of the business, in accordance with his position and ability, and especially as it relates to his own work.

"On March 1, 1919, at the 'dividend day' meeting, I announced to the men that we had decided to ask them to elect three of their number to sit on the board of directors of the company—the body that has the authority to discharge me, or the general superintendent, or the general manager, or any other officer of the company.

"I told the men that this meant that their influence and voice would run through the whole organization more fully than ever before; and that this influence, these rights, placed upon them a corresponding obligation.

"'The only real test of the plan's success,' I explained, 'is contentment and the greater production that comes from contentment, based on the realization that you are assured, in accordance with your position and ability, a free and full voice in the conduct of the industry to which you are giving your lives.'

"Steps such as these may seem iconoclastic to many business men, but they are the logical sequence of the distribution of profits carried on by this company for more than three decades.

"'Tell me how your profit-sharing plan works,' other employers sometimes say to me. 'I want to start something of the sort myself. I believe it will pay in the long run.'

"'If that is your object, don't do it,' I always answer. 'No one can build a sound profit-sharing plan on the desire to make money. You must be possessed of the conviction, not only that a fair share of the profit existing without the profit-sharing plan belongs to the worker, but that under the profit-sharing plan the worker will produce enough additional to pay his profit-sharing dividend. Your interests must be primarily in the men and seeing that they have the opportunity of earning, through increased interest, the additional money; and, above all, you must realize that it is more than money that the men want; it is a sense of ownership, that can be, in part at least, developed through profit sharing. Without this unselfish motive on the part of the employer, profit sharing will never be a success, for both he and the men in the end will distrust each other and be dissatisfied with any distribution made.

"Our profit-sharing program started back in 1886, when the Knights of Labor movement was agitating American workmen.

In one year we had no fewer than 14 strikes, and men were quitting daily for trivial causes.

"I was just out of college, with rather radical ideas, for those times, on business problems. The situation distressed me. Day in and day out I was working beside these men, nearly all of whom I could call by their first names.

"One of my earliest adventures in industrial discontent was the discovery of the fact that these men were working too long hours. I talked the matter over with my father, who was then at the head of the firm, and persuaded him to give the men Saturday half holiday. So far as I know, we were the first firm in the country to take this step.

"The next move in order was to make the men feel that their own interests and the interests of the firm were identical. So we worked out our first profit-sharing plan. To build the framework for this plan was no slight job, for we were pioneers and had to blaze our own trail.

"We finally decided that net profits should be divided between the firm and its employees in the proportion that the men's wages bore to the total cost of production. To illustrate: Assume that we paid $20,000 a year in wages, spent another $70,000 in additional manufacturing costs, and had a total sales for the year of $100,000. Then, the $10,000 difference between our costs and our sales would be net profit, and would be divided two-ninths to the men and seven-ninths to the firm.

"This system was crude, but it was a far reach forward for those days. The men received it rather half-heartedly; but when at the end of the first six months they were paid a dividend of 11 per cent of their wages, signs of interest began to be shown.

"The first year this plan was in operation we had three strikes. Since then we have had only one strike in our history, and that was forced at a branch plant by I. W. W. pressure from the outside.

"From 1887 to 1903 we made numerous changes in the plan, one of which was to give up the system of costs and profits, and to pay every worker in the plant, twice a year, a dividend of 12 per cent of his wages.

"All these plans had one serious defect in common—the workers looked on their semiannual 'dividend day' checks as merely extra wages, and spent them as such. Very little of this money was going into their savings accounts.

"For a time this situation baffled us. Then I decided that we could place a premium on thrift by requiring the men to save a certain fraction of their wages before they would receive any extra money from the firm. Through the plan that went into effect in 1903 we said, in substance, to each workman, male and female, in our employ:

"'To every dollar you save we will add $4, until as much money as you make in a year has been accumulated. This money is then yours. Our only stipulation is that it must be invested in the common stock of the company. We expect our stock to increase greatly in value. That increase, too, will be yours. However, we will protect you against depreciation. If you should ever decide to leave the company, and your stock should then be below the market price at which you obtained it, we promise to return to you in cash that full market price.'

"Before going further into the exact operation of this plan, it may be illuminative to glance at the histories of some of the men and women who have taken advantage of it. These histories may be picked almost at random from our books. Here is a typical case:

"On July 1, 1903, a blacksmith, making 27 cents an hour, subscribed for stock to the amount of his annual wages, $842.40. His further purchases of stock under the profit-sharing plan, due to wage increases and longer service, belong to principles of that plan which I have not yet explained; so I will simply turn to that part of the record which shows that on June 1, 1919, this man, still a blacksmith, although his wages were then about 65 cents an hour, owned stock to the value of $6,286, and yet all the cash he ever paid toward the purchase of that stock was $692.72, about 11 per cent of the total value!

"The figures cited refer merely to the stock that this man had accumulated directly through the profit-sharing plan. There is a limit, based on wages, to the amount of the stock that can be so obtained. Most of our old employees, however, once they have reached this limit, have been so encouraged by the rewards of thrift that they have bought stock in the open market. So it happens that men who had only 6, 8, 10, or 12 shares of 'profit-sharing' stock, are owners of from 1 to more than 80 shares which they have purchased (usually through us) in the open market. And I am referring to workmen and foremen, not managers and superintendents.

"To illustrate my point, let me take the case of another man who subscribed for stock in 1903, when he was making 42 cents an hour. He acquired 12 shares of stock through the profit-sharing plan by cash payments of only $1,229.48. This block was merely an impetus to his thrift. In 16 years he bought, as an investment, 83 additional shares, and on June 1, 1919, this man—now a blacksmith foreman, at 95 cents an hour—was worth $65,000. Of course, the stock for which he originally subscribed had increased greatly in value during that time.

"I have in mind one stenographer who has been working for the company 23 years. She came at a salary of $9.50 per week, and is now making $150 per month. During these 23 years, in addition to supporting dependents, she has managed to save $7,000, or about $300 a year. At the present time she owns 37 shares of stock, worth more than $26,000. Nineteen thousand dollars of this amount has come to her in profit-sharing rewards, cash dividends, and appreciation in stock values. This woman has been shown no special favoritism, and her case is not at all exceptional.

"In giving a somewhat clearer picture of the manner in which our profit-sharing system is operated, I shall describe the plan followed, with minor modifications, from 1903 to July 1, 1919, when a new plan went into effect. There is little difference in principle in the two plans, and the employees whose cases I cite have made their profits under the old plan.

"This plan was intended to benefit the workingmen—to encourage thrift among those drawing a small wage. So we stipulated that no man making more than $1,500 a year should be allowed to take advantage of it. (The plan of July 1, 1919, raised this limit to $2,000, on account of the recent increase in wages. We will advance the limit again if the pay envelope of the workingman drives it up.)

"'When you subscribe to this stock,' we said to our men, 'you must pay down 2½ per cent, or one-fortieth of its market value, and you must further pay 4 per cent of it each year until your part is paid for.

"'In the meantime we will give you each year one-fifth of the amount of your wage, which we will call a 20 per cent dividend on the stock. This is to be deducted on our books from the amount you will owe for the stock. At the end of four or five years the stock is yours, and you will have paid out of your savings less than 20 per cent of its value. The company will have given you all the rest as a reward for your thrift.

"'We will hold this stock for you. After five years you may buy enough additional stock to bring your holdings up to one and one-quarter times your annual salary, provided you are not making above the $1,500 limit. At the same time the 20 per cent profit-sharing dividend will be increased to 25 per cent a year. After 10 years you may again buy extra stock to bring your total holdings up to one and one-half times your annual salary, and your "profit-sharing dividend" will be increased to 30 per cent, which we will pay you each year so long as you remain in our employ and have not passed beyond the salary limit.

"'If your wages are raised above $1,500, we will see that they are at least $1,800, to make up for what you lose by passing beyond the operation of this plan. Your stock will then be placed in your personal possession.'

"Naturally there are many other details to the plan. Two that I may mention in passing are the 3 per cent interest we have charged employees on their unpaid balance, and the regular cash dividends on the stock which they have received from the start—just as all other stockholders received them. These two items about balance each other, however.

"Let us take one further case of an employee to see how all this works out. I will select a soap stamper, who was making 16 cents an hour at the time he entered the plan. His history is briefly this:

	Shares.
Subscribed for stock on Mar. 1, 1904, to the amount of his annual wages	1.49
Additional purchase from increase in wages	1.96
Additional purchase from 5-year and 10-year increase of stock allowed him	1.01
Extra shares given him on increase in capital stock	3.09
	7.55

"His original subscription was paid for in six years. His own cash payments totaled only $243.36.

"On June 1, 1919, this man was making 65 cents an hour as a department foreman. His stock was worth $5,285.

"In order to avoid confusion, I shall not go into the new profit-sharing plan in detail. Its essential points of difference from the one I have been describing are:

"PLAN PRIOR TO JULY 1, 1919.

"Two and one-half per cent.
"Four per cent of total paid each year.
"Fifteen hundred-dollar wage limit.
"Twenty per cent profit-sharing dividend.

"PRESENT PLAN.

"No cash down.
"Five per cent each year.
"Two thousand-dollar limit.
"Sliding scale of dividends.

"The old axiom that the 'first thousand dollars comes hardest' is really the motive of our profit-sharing system. We help a man to save a year's salary. He is started on the road of thrift. Finding its rewards surprisingly great, he continues to save and invest his money in the stock that gave him the impetus. We are always ready to lend our men money at a small rate of interest to make purchases of stock in the open market.

"The higher salaried employees of the firm have been liberal investors in stock ever since the incorporation in 1890, 13 years before the profit-sharing system was instituted. We have encouraged them to become investors by a plan which allows them to pay $25 a share down and 10 per cent of the total each year. Four per cent interest is charged on unpaid balances, but this is covered by cash dividends they receive.

"One of our salesmen, who began buying stock in the early days, came to us at an annual salary of less than $1,000 a year and never made more than $7,000 a year during his career with the company. Yet when he retired, a few years ago, he was worth three-quarters of a million of dollars.

"Profit sharing has many attendant advantages. For one thing, it inclines a man to stay on the job by giving him a vital interest in the business. Fifty-six men at the Ivorydale plant have been with us from 25 to 40 years. Nearly half of the more than 2,700 workers are employees of from 1 to 40 years' standing. The average annual turnover shown in industrial plants is 120 per cent—twice the annual turnover shown at Ivorydale. Our records show that if a man stays with the company one month—long enough to get fairly acquainted—he is likely to remain here indefinitely.

"I believe that the spirit of thrift and the sense of responsibility that have come to our men through the profit-sharing plan have had much to do with the rapid development of leaders among them.

"All but one of the men in places of power with this company to-day have come up through the ranks, and most of them started at not more than a day laborer's or a clerk's salary. Our general superintendent began work as a boy in the box factory at $2 a week. The superintendent of the plant at Port Ivory, N. Y., entered our employ 16 years ago as a $45 a month bill-of-lading clerk. Our chief engineer at Cincinnati started at $5 a week. It is only 15 years since our general sales manager was a $60-a-month clerk in the treasurer's department. The central and western sales managers broke in as office boys, and so the list might be carried on.

"Our experience, however, has proved to us the great value of a college education, and I can not urge young men too strongly upon this point. While all but one of the men in places of power in this company to-day have come up through the ranks, over 80 per cent of those men drawing salaries in excess of $3,000 a year are college graduates. They start with the crowd, but the trained mind demonstrates its value as truly as the skilled laborer stands out over the unskilled.

"Remembering how these men came out of the crowd and forced recognition of their merits, I have slight sympathy with the theory that luck plays a controlling part in business success. Luck exists, of course, and some folk seem to get more than their share of it, but to every man comes enough luck so that he will be able to make his mark if he has the native ability, ambition, and vision to measure up to his opportunities.

"The first promotion, that which lifts a man from the crowd, is the hardest to get. It is like the private's promotion to corporal. But once the workman has become a foreman, or is given any position with authority over other men, he has risen where he can be seen. He will be seen, too, for every employer is sweeping his organization with a spyglass to seek out ability.

"Looking back over the lives of the men whom I have watched as they won their way to leadership, I find five marked characteristics. They have been aggressive, truthful, unselfish, and courageous, with the power of decision and determination to carry decision through. Lacking any one of these, and especially the latter, a man's success is very doubtful; granted the five, it is assured.

"Aggressiveness and good health usually lodge together; that is why I am always preaching the gospel of physical fitness. Look over the world's leaders and you will find, for the most part, men of tireless physical vigor. Some great men have been frail, a few have been invalids, but each case is an exception to the rule. Most great men have been charged with the physical vigor out of which is born much of the dynamic force that drives them through to success. Men who work their minds for 16 hours a day and slight their bodies are violating the laws of the very success they seek. I firmly believe that 50 per cent of whatever I have been able to accomplish has been due to strength and endurance.

"From 20 to 25, or the first few years out of school, is the most important period in a man's life. If he has not found himself, if he has failed to make some definite impression by the time he is 27 or 28, barriers will have been built up in front of him which only the very exceptional men can scale.

"Sometimes one will hear a young man remark, 'I can afford to take things easy until I am 30 or 35. Then I will make up for lost time.' This is the most foolish of fallacies. Men who make their mark in middle age almost invariably have established an outstanding reputation for ability, aggressiveness, and ambition in the first years of their business life.

"Real genius may be handicapped, but never permanently held down, by being misplaced. Yet each employer has a great responsibility to make sure that he is helping his men to develop themselves by giving them jobs that 'fit' them and that measure up to their abilities. We put 100-horsepower loads on 50-horsepower men and break them. We put 50-horsepower loads on 100-horsepower men and there is unused energy running to waste. The most successful employer is the one who can most closely match the load to the man.

"I have already mentioned my belief that no man can handle his job with full efficiency and economy unless he knows why he is doing it and what it costs. The next step this company is going to take will be based on these facts. We are going to let each department share in the lessened cost of production. Our books will be thrown open to the men; they can see for themselves the costs of production in their departments for a given period. We hope so to arrange matters that each department that is able to obtain the same results more cheaply will divide the savings with the firm.

"This is simply another adventure in common sense and justice. The laboring man wants no one to become hysterical or sentimental over him. He resents it. All he wants is to be treated fairly.

"One thing we have continually tried to avoid is any interference with the private life of our workers. I have always felt that the employer who follows up his direction of a workman's job by telling him what he should do at home is unduly impertinent to a man's soul.

"Any system of rewarding labor must be predicated on the fact that every man shall return value received for what he gets, otherwise the system is unsound and can not continue.

"My greatest pride in our profit-sharing plan comes from the knowledge that it reaches the minds of our workers as well as their pocketbooks. Out of thrift has come independence; out of independence has come freedom and happiness. We have not only given our men additional money—we have helped them to find additional ideals."

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I ask to have inserted in the RECORD, in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Illinois relative to distribution of expenditures, chapter 38 of the Universal Postal Union, which answers the question which I asked and which, I think, is important for the Senate to know, not only in connection with the expenses of this organization but of the secretariat as well? I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the chapter to which I have referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

DIVISION OF THE EXPENSES OF THE INTERNATIONAL BUREAU.

"1. The ordinary expenses of the international bureau must not exceed the sum of 125,000 francs annually, irrespective of the special expenses to which the meeting of a congress or of a conference gives rise.

"2. The Swiss postal administration supervises the expenses of the international bureau, makes the necessary advances, and prepares the annual account, which is communicated to all the other administrations.

"For the apportionment of the expenses the countries of the union are divided into seven classes, each contributing in the proportion of a certain number of units, viz:

"First class, 25 units.
"Second class, 20 units.
"Third class, 15 units.
"Fourth class, 10 units.
"Fifth class, 5 units.
"Sixth class, 3 units.
"Seventh class, 1 unit.

"4. These coefficients are multiplied by the number of countries of each class, and the total of the products thus obtained furnishes the number of units by which the whole expense is to be divided. The quotient gives the amount of the unit of expense.

"5. The countries of the union are classified as follows, in view of the division of expenses:

"First class: Germany, Austria, United States of America, France, Great Britain, Hungary, British India, Commonwealth of Australia, Canada, the British colonies and protectorates of South Africa, the whole of the other British colonies and protectorates, Italy, Japan, Russia, Turkey.

"Second class: Spain.

"Third class: Belgium, Brazil, Egypt, Netherlands, Roumania, Sweden, Switzerland, Algeria, French colonies and protectorates in Indo-China, the whole of the other French colonies, the whole of the insular possessions of the United States of America, Dutch East Indies.

"Fourth class: Denmark, Norway, Portugal, Portuguese colonies in Africa, the whole of the other Portuguese colonies.

"Fifth class: Argentine Republic, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Chile, Colombia, Greece, Mexico, Peru, Serbia, Tunis.

"Sixth class: Bolivia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guatemala, Hayti, Republic of Honduras, Luxemberg, Republic of Nicaragua, Republic of Panama, Paraguay, Persia, Republic of Salvador, Kingdom of Siam, Uruguay, Venezuela, German protectorates in Africa, German protectorates in Asia and Australasia, Danish colonies, Colony of Curaçao (or Dutch West Indies), Colony of Surinam (or Dutch Guiana).

"Seventh class: Congo Free State, Corea, Crete, Spanish establishments in the Gulf of Guinea, the whole of the Italian colonies, Liberia, Montenegro."

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very glad the Senator from Michigan has had it incorporated in the RECORD in connection with my presentation of the matter. It will be valuable for future purposes as well.

Mr. President, there is in the periodical Industry of October 15, 1919, an article entitled "Will the international labor conference menace American industrial progress?" In commenting it says:

> The make-up of this conference is comparatively easy to understand. There will be delegates from England, France, Italy, and various other European countries, and the bulk of these delegates will be socialists or radicals, intent on putting into effect the socialistic and radical plans. Now, there are two things which industry in the United States must regard with apprehension. One is an attempt to impose the closed shop, or the socialistically conducted shop, on the country, and the other is the imposition of the limited working day, which is part of the program of the socialists and the labor unionists. Both the closed shop and the 40-hour or 44-hour week mean in the very first analysis decreased production, increased cost of production, and increased cost of living. It means the strangling of individual initiative and effort, the imposition of restrictions designed to put all workmen on the common footing of mediocrity, and it places in the control of a few leaders the very life of industry in this country. The public has a greater interest in the maintenance of the open shop and the maintenance of proper and normal production than the employer has.
> This international labor conference will be largely composed of men committed to these principles.

And, as if in precise arrangement for the purpose of dovetailing in these provisions, it is enumerated that the application of the principle of the 8-hour day or the 48-hour week shall be taken up in the first conference to be held in this country.

We are vitally concerned not only in the peace questions that I have already referred to but in the question of the closed shop. Suppose the international conference now in session in Washington should declare in favor of the closed shop. The greater part—I believe a majority, at least—of the delegates in this conference are committed to this economic principle, as they call it. Suppose they pass a resolution before ending that conference imposing upon this country, even though we are not officially represented, the closed shop or a limited number of hours per day. They disperse to their various countries. Some representative of a country concerned—Germany, for instance—makes complaint. The delegates from Germany are sitting in this conference, I have understood. The delegates from Japan are sitting in this conference. Their members can be found in their seats to-day if you go over to the Pan American Building. If they are in this country and in this conference for any good purpose toward the United States, no person searching the motives of men can find it out. The German delegates, if present, are here to promote industrial mischief. Japan is here for the purpose of increasing her trade. Their export trade now with the United States has increased amazingly in the last four years. They have taken no considerable part in the late war. They have not exhausted their credit, their man power, nor their industrial plant in anything they contributed to the struggle. When they had expelled the Germans from Shantung their decisive action was over. They did concern themselves somewhat in Siberia, but that is purely for prudential reasons. They expect sooner or later to effect a lodgment of their Government on this part of the mainland of Asia. Every move they have made is dictated by a purely national selfish purpose. From their viewpoint they are justified, but in our country we are equally justified in taking such defensive steps against any industrial inroads they may make on us or in binding ourselves in a league or any international labor conference in which they may have advantages.

Suppose, to carry on further what naturally would follow when this conference has dispersed, the Germans, within a few months or a few weeks, the treaty of peace having been ratified and Germany recognized as having resumed her international and diplomatic relations with this country, makes complaint. On that complaint a commission of inquiry is created. The commission of inquiry investigate. They make a finding on the closed shop. Great Britain's industrial representatives would be inclined to vote that way. Some 85 or 90 per cent, possibly, of all of Great Britain's employees are unionized. Their delegates representing labor will be a closed-shop delegation in our country. In all probability the Government delegate representing the United Kingdom of Great Britain will not feel like provoking a quarrel with labor interests of their own country by opposing the closed-shop procedure. Arthur Henderson and his allies in industrial England will be able to overcome any scruples that Lloyd-George and his ministry would have, or their delegate representing them, against the closed shop. It is fair to presume, from local conditions in Great Britain, that both their delegates will be found joining with the German delegates and the delegates from the smaller countries, socialistic in their nature. Some of the Spanish delegates are not to be trusted upon this question. They will be found joining to adopt a resolution for a closed shop.

This is the beginning of internationalism. This conference is the first step in international procedure. It is the first step in international procedure in labor questions. It is the practical expression of industrial internationalism.

When they have proceeded thus far, passing the appropriate resolution for the closed shop, they will make complaint if we do not adopt it. The economic retaliation to be applied under stress of labor conditions in England and by deliberate purpose, without regard to the merits of the controversy, in Japan, would provide that all articles manufactured in our country in an open shop will be denied admission into their market.

That is the first practical economic boycott that can be applied to our affairs by the international labor conference. This, therefore, under the provisions of the sections sought to be stricken out by this motion would create a discrimination against some of the largest producing centers in our country. The United States Steel Co. is an open shop; the various plants of the Link Belt Co., of which Charles Pease, of Chicago and Philadelphia, is the leading spirit, is an open shop. I need not enumerate others of the largest concerns in the United States which are to-day operating on an open-shop basis. They make no discrimination against any member of a labor union, but they do not pledge themselves to employ only union labor. They employ any fit laborer that applies. The men at the heads of large enterprises are in danger of having their open-shop methods revolutionized and destroyed by the action of foreign countries. If the open shop ends, it ought to go as the result of our domestic action; the closed shop ought not to be forced upon us from abroad by an international labor conference, and by a species of internationalism that is utterly alien to our institutions.

Mr. President, the danger on the question of the open and closed shop that is contained within the limits of the articles I have quoted is a very grave one; it is not an imaginary danger. Before the international conference now in session shall have adjourned there will be enough happen from the radicals and the alien firebrands that are in our midst to justify me in what I say to-day. It is further stated here:

> It is all very well to talk of the limitations imposed by our Constitution, but it is an unfortunate fact that our position in international affairs to-day inevitably limits our Constitution, no matter what the judgment of the courts may be. If the international conference at Washington, with the cooperation of part of the delegates of the United States, indorses the closed shop and the 44-hour week, this country will have to stand before the world as repudiating the findings of a conference which it helped to create and in which it participated.

We are not officially participating in it, since the treaty and the league covenant have not yet been ratified, but under the provisions of the proclamation under which these delegates assembled, we are morally bound by their actions. The only way we can free ourselves from that moral obligation is to strike out of this treaty the articles referred to. Continuing the reading:

> If we argue that the Constitution does not permit the legislative enforcement of the findings of the conference we shall be met with the argument that the spirit of the people should be sufficient to compel acceptance and application of the findings of the conference.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD the whole of this article from Industry of October 15, 1919, without reading more of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARDING in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article entire is as follows:

[From Industry, Oct. 15, 1919.]

"WILL THE INTERNATIONAL LABOR CONFERENCE MENACE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS?

"While interest in the industrial conference which is now being held in Washington is naturally very great, this conference must not be permitted to overshadow in the minds of the people, of all the people, the gravity of the conference which will assemble in Washington on October 29—the international labor conference provided for in the peace treaty. This will be something new, not only in our domestic affairs but in international affairs, and let it be said emphatically that it may be fraught with danger to the United States. We have called attention to this conference before in Industry, but its extreme significance does not seem to be understood or appreciated.

"This international conference is the first of annual meetings made possible under the peace treaty, and delegates from all the European countries will participate. Our own representation will be comparatively negligible when compared with the total membership of the conference. There are a variety of proposals which may be considered. Some of them are sociological, some are humanitarian, some are socialistic, and some are directly in the interest of specific classes. There is just as much possibility that the socialistic and special class programs will prevail as that the sociological and humanitarian programs will be put into effect.

"The make-up of this conference is comparatively easy to understand. There will be delegates from England, France, Italy, and various other European countries, and the bulk of these delegates will be socialists or radicals, intent on putting into effect socialistic and radical plans. Now, there are two things which industry in the United States must regard with apprehension. One is an attempt to impose the closed shop, or the socialistically conducted shop, on the country, and the other is the imposition of the limited working day, which is part of the program of the socialist and the labor unionist. Both the closed shop and the 40-hour or 44-hour week mean in the very first analysis decreased production, increased cost of production, and increased cost of living. It means the strangling of individual initiative and effort, the imposition of restrictions designed to put all workmen on the common footing of mediocrity, and it places in the control of a few leaders the very life of industry in this country. The public has a greater interest in the maintenance of the open shop and the maintenance of proper and normal production than the employer has.

"This international labor conference will be largely composed of men committed to these principles. It is all very well to talk of the limitations imposed by our Constitution, but it is an unfortunate fact that our position in international affairs to-day inevitably limits our Constitution, no matter what the judgment of the courts may be. If the international conference at Washington, with the cooperation of part of the delegates of the United States, indorses the closed shop and the 44-hour week, this country will have to stand before the world as repudiating the findings of a conference which it helped to create and in which it participated. If we argue that the Constitution does not permit the legislative enforcement of the findings of the conference, we shall be met with the argument that the spirit of the people should be sufficient to compel acceptance and application of the findings of the conference.

"Under the treaty, economic pressure may be brought against us if we fail to enforce the findings of this conference, and we must not assume that this economic pressure will be lacking, because if other nations find it within their power to force us into an industrial position which will bring chaos, it will be to their advantage very materially. We have subscribed, through our representative in Paris, to the idea of this international conference, and we can not repudiate the findings on technical grounds. In other words, we are committed to something which is destructive to ourselves, which is un-American, which is unconstitutional, but which we have passed our word to recognize and follow.

"The open shop must be maintained in the United States irrespective of international obligations, peace treaties, and everything else. The prosperity of the country, the maintenance of its industries, the comfort of its inhabitants are superior to what might be called a technical violation of our word of honor, because that word was not given with the assent of the people of the United States. It was part of a bargain, of a diplomatic bargain, done without consideration of its ultimate effects. The people of the country must understand what it means and must repudiate in advance any action of the International Labor Conference which is in conflict with the best interests of the Nation.

"One or two Senators of the United States, with vision and understanding, have already pointed out the danger in the labor articles in the peace treaty. They should go further and emphasize these dangers, and the Senate of the United States should amend the labor articles so as to preserve to the United States its industrial independence and industrial strength. A reservation should be attached to the labor articles to the effect that no findings of the International Labor Conference will be regarded as binding on the United States which is in any way in conflict with our Constitution. This will serve notice as to our official attitude and will supplement and make positive the action which our people must take to preserve their industrial integrity. Our word of honor passed in Paris must be clarified and illuminated, made plain and definite, showing that the United States is not going to turn over its industries to the dictation of a socialistically constituted conference, whether international or domestic."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, referring to the open and closed shop, there is one other subject which I think would concern the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. I could probably refer my comments to the employers' side of the question, but connected with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the other three railway brotherhoods there is another matter that ought to concern the union labor, the employees' side of the controversy. There is very great care taken by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers to enforce observance of the orders issued by their authorities. On page 53, in section 92, of the constitution and statutes of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, I find a provision which anticipated by several years the provisions of the espionage act which we used during the war. I now read:

All divisions, or members of divisions, are prohibited from issuing circulars or signing any form of petition relative to brotherhood business among members of the brotherhood or others. If issued by a division, its charter shall be suspended; and the length of such suspension shall be at the discretion of the grand chief engineer. If issued or signed by a member, he shall be suspended or expelled: Provided, That the foregoing shall not prevent or hinder in any manner any official or division of the brotherhood in properly conducting the business of the organization as to sending out notices, reports, etc., for the purpose of securing or giving information.

Suppose that should be deemed restrictive of the right of free speech among organized labor; if the radical in the International Labor Conference should have it fall under his watchful eye, it is not a far-fetched conclusion that the radical would be dissatisfied. One of the principal privileges of the soviet and of radicals in a public body is to talk. They have all of the qualifications of a Senator in that particular. Constant use of language to them is dearer than an increase of wages or a shortening of hours. If their vigilant eyes should fall upon section 92 of the regulations I have read, it might lead to unfavorable action. They might regard that as applied to North America as requiring treatment by the conference. The brotherhood operates in Canada, Mexico, and the United States. Canada is under the influence of Great Britain's delegates, and their delegates sitting in this conference would join with those of the United Kingdom.

Let it be observed here that Great Britain has in this conference not the two delegates but she has delegates from each of her five self-governing colonial possessions. Australia, if not already represented, will be represented by delegates. Great Britain will have, in other words, six times the representation of the United States, even if we were lawfully within the conference.

It is not a violent interpretation to say that these regulations, applicable in Canada and in the United States by the brotherhood, would be a subject of action by the conference, and that a hostile resolution repealing, modifying, or wholly eliminating such a provision could be passed.

On page 93 there is another section applying to the brotherhood in Canada which reads:

Any member or division refusing to sustain the official acts or instructions of the legislative board or who circulates or signs a petition; or who by verbal or written communication to railroad officials or others that is calculated to injure or interfere with legislative matters offered by the legislative board; or at any time make suggestions to railroad officials or to dominion or provincial legislators that may be detrimental to the interest of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; or who by verbal or written communication to anyone calculated to injure or interfere with national legislative matters offered by our legislative representative at Washington, Canada, or Mexico—

The brotherhood includes all the English-speaking engineers in Mexico, which in normal times would embrace about all the engineers operating trains in that Republic—or at any time make suggestions to anyone that may be detrimental to the interests of such legislation, shall be expelled when proven guilty, as per section 49 of statutes.

I present further sections from the same source:

SEC. 51. Any member of the B. of L. E. who takes the place of anyone engaged in a strike recognized as legal by the B. of L. E. shall be expelled when proven guilty, and shall forever be ineligible for readmittance to this brotherhood. (Statutes, p. 40.)

SEC. 54. When any member or members of a subdivision (except chairman of the local committee) take up directly with the general chairman, verbally or written, any question where other members' interest is involved or asked for a ruling upon any question, the general chairman must refuse to grant such a request or ruling until the proposition has been submitted to the subdivision for their consideration. If carried by a majority of the members present, the secretary will furnish the general chairman all the facts in the case, who will furnish the subdivision with his ruling or interpretation, as the case might be.

Any member who by verbal or written communication to railroad officials or others interferes with a grievance that is in the hands of the committee, or at any other time makes any suggestion to any official that may cause discord in any division, shall be expelled as per sections 49 and 54 of the statutes, when proven guilty, provided, however, this law shall not apply to a brother in official position when called upon to express an opinion in his official capacity.

SEC. 35. Any member of the general committee of adjustments who willfully and premeditatedly does, with malicious intent by act or word, in the presence of any railroad official, injure any matter under discussion by said committee which has for its purpose the enforcement of the standing rules of the G. I. D., shall, by a two-thirds vote of said committee, be deprived of serving on the same, the general chairman to fill such vacancy from the membership of the division to which the deposed member belonged, he serving until relieved by one appointed by the division so affected. (Standing Rules, p. 78.)

Those regulations all could be made the basis of equally hostile action in the conference.

Reading from the Washington Times of this afternoon:

The latest mystery: Where are the German and Austrian delegates to the international labor conference?

The State Department has information that they have not yet sailed from Holland, while other delegates from continental Europe believe they will show up in Washington at any time.

There seems to be some question about their passports. I was informed last night—and on that basis I made the statement I did a while ago—that the German delegates had arrived. I correct my former statement. The Japanese delegates are here and are visible in the flesh. The German delegates, according to a press report I saw not long ago, had sailed some days before that time from a European port bound for New York. Where they are at this time nobody knows, but very likely they will turn up before the conference is ended.

Because of the difficulties that might arise from the action of the conference in connection with local regulations in our own country and in other sovereign States in North America, we ought to enter into this international conference with great care, if we enter it at all. I think we are better off to stay out of it, for no good can come from it. With our great area, our industrial development, our surplus requiring export, if normal relations shall again be resumed we are abundantly able to take care of ourselves, and unless burdensome restrictions are placed upon us to take care of any surplus that may require an outlet in a foreign market.

There is another question that is very likely to be taken up, namely, the piecework problem. Many of the most expert of the artisans of this country are employed on a piecework basis. It is opposed by some of the unions because those who are competent outstrip in their earnings those less competent. It is proposed to reduce the skillful to a mediocre basis. Therefore there is an undercurrent of hostility found in many of the labor unions against the piecework plan. The less skillful—and in many instances they are the most numerous in the local unions—oppose the piecework plan. The more skillful in any occupation are apt to be in the minority, but they are potent agents of production. Still on the question of piecework the dissatisfied radical in this country may join with the radicals of other countries in an international labor conference and enforce upon us a limitation upon piecework which would interfere materially with our productive capacity. That is something wholly within the power of the conference to do. At any time a hostile measure may come from the conference and may be enforced upon us by the usual economic processes to which I have referred.

I wish to close this discussion, Mr. President, by reading the condition of the British East Indies and the conduct of the United Kingdom of Great Britain with that country. I read from "The New Map of Asia," by Herbert A. Gibbons, a recent publication by the Century Co., published in 1919. From page 41 I quote:

A maharaja told me in 1916, "We can not stand the British much longer." Economically, famines are more and more frequent, and the British authorities seem to be less able to cope with them than formerly. Trade returns show that England is taking $150,000,000 every year out of India with no commercial or material return.

In connection with the same subject, I now read from pages 54 and 55 of the same volume. These are matters that will come into this conference:

The average life of the Indian is 23 years, of the Englishman 40 years, of the New Zealander 60 years. In 1850 the average earning of an Indian was 4 cents a day. This sum fell to 3 cents in 1882 and to 1½ cents in 1900. The majority of the population of India goes through life without ever having enough to eat. This state of affairs did not exist before England started to drain India of her wealth. It exists in no other portion of the earth's surface. It does not exist in neighboring, equally densely populated countries that are not directly under British rule.

Every enemy of Great Britain in Europe and Asia in this conference will aggravate, by proper agitation, the feeling of the East Indian on this subject. During the war, Germany provoked the Afghans to an expedition across the borders of northern British India. They supposed they would meet with the demonstrations of the East Indians amounting to a revolt. It was quelled without the hoped-for disturbance, but it shows the activity of the enemy nations of Great Britain in various parts of these continents. It will break out naturally in the international peace conference, because the conditions are such as to provoke constant controversy.

On page 144, I read the following:

The record of European diplomacy in the Near East from 1815 to 1919 has no redeeming feature.

Eighteen hundred and fifteen marks the time of the close of the congress of Vienna, when there was a partition of territory, a union of powers, a balancing of the rights and wrongs and strengths and weaknesses of European nations; it was hailed as the threshold of universal peace.

From the congress of Vienna to the conference of Paris it did not change. Heartlessness and selfishness were its characteristics. The interests of the races of the Ottoman Empire, Moslem and Christian alike, were consistently sacrificed to fancied interests of the powers. Never once did European statesmen, assembled to solve Near Eastern problems, make a decision actuated by a desire to protect or to help the races whose fate was in their hands.

It is an error to believe that there has been a change of heart in the twentieth century. Before the outbreak of the Balkan War, on October 8, 1912, the six great powers notified the Balkan States that: "(1) The powers condemn energetically every measure capable of leading to rupture of peace; (2) supporting themselves on article 23 of the treaty of Berlin, the powers will take in hand, in the interest of the populations, the realization of the reforms in the administration of European Turkey on the understanding that these reforms will not diminish the sovereignty of His Imperial Majesty the Sultan and the territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire; (3) if, in spite of this note, war does break out between the Balkan States and the Ottoman Empire, they will not admit, at the end of the conflict, any modification of the territorial status quo in European Turkey."

These countries are represented in the international conference. Great Britain is represented. The seeds of intrigue are present. The desire to promote revolution in East India and all of Great Britain's colonial possessions in Asia is present and the instigation that could have its origin in the international peace conference is such as to endanger our own domestic peace and welfare. Instead of having this body here, I think it ought to be in the countries where the trouble began. All of these difficulties were made in Europe. No one of them was made in the United States. This war was made in Europe. It was not made here. We were at peace. We are at peace now, and the only place in the world where countries are in armed collision is in the Old World. Those places are necessarily the ones where disputes have proceeded to that extreme, growing out of the so-called league of nations and peace treaty and the new boundaries created.

There is a very excellent article in the November number of the Protectionist, under the heading of "Labor" provisions of the treaty of peace." It analyzes the various sections to which I have alluded yesterday and to-day. It shows the representation, the jurisdiction of the conference, and how that jurisdiction may materially embroil us in the controversies of the world, as well as how it may interfere with the domestic industrial questions that are exclusively local to our country. This I should like permission to incorporate in the RECORD at length without reading, because I think it is a valuable contribution to the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Protectionist for November, 1919, p. 398.]

"LABOR" PROVISIONS OF THE TREATY OF PEACE.

[By Edward N. Dingley.]

In the discussion of the terms of the treaty of peace between the United States and the allied nations on the one hand and Germany on the other, comparatively little notice has been taken of what is designated as Part XIII, under the title of "Labor." Yet this portion of the treaty, occupying about 10 pages of the entire 213 comprising the voluminous document, contains provisions of vital and far-reaching importance, especially to the United States. The much-discussed covenant of the league of nations, which occupies the first 9 pages of the official document following the signatures, embodies a no more serious and revolutionary program than the 10 pages of the treaty of peace which are devoted to "labor." In short, the "covenant" and "labor" sections very properly may be deemed the "explosive by-products" of a treaty designed to contain conditions of peace.

The underlying principle of the "labor" provisions, as of the "covenant," is internationalism. Its objects are set forth in the preamble:

"Whereas the league of nations has for its object the establishment of universal peace, and such a peace can be established only if it is based on social justice; and

"Whereas conditions of labor exist involving such injustice, hardship, and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperiled; and an improvement of these conditions is urgently required," etc.

[Here follows an enumeration of the alleged wrongs and the remedies proposed.]

The proposed "organization of labor" is planned to be an adjunct of the league of nations—a wheel within a wheel. Ratification of the treaty of peace by the United States will automatically make the United States a member of the International Labor Conference. The original members of the league of nations "shall be the members of the labor organization." Since there are to be 32 original members of the league of nations, there will be the same number of members of the international labor organization. The permanent organization "shall be (1) a general conference of representatives and (2) an international labor office controlled by a governing body." The general conference shall meet at least once a year and "shall be composed of four representatives of each of the members"; two shall be Government delegates and one shall be an employers' delegate and one an employees' delegate. Each delegate may be accompanied by not more than two advisers without votes.

Under this plan the general conference of representatives of the members will consist of 128 delegates, 64 representing the several Governments, 32 representing the employers, and 32 representing the work people. The 64 "non-Government delegates," as they are called, are to be chosen "in agreement with the industrial organizations which are most representative of employers or work people." There is no specific provision for the selection of the 64 Government delegates. Presumably they will be named by the heads of the respective Governments or by the persons representing the respective nations in the league of nations. The 64 "non-Government" delegates, if "chosen in agreement," must be agreeable to both employers and employees. No procedure is provided in case of a disagreement.

The following countries, self-governing colonies or dependencies, each will have four delegates in the general conference of representatives: United States; Belgium; Brazil; British Empire, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India; China; Cuba; Ecuador; France; Serb-Croat-Slovene State; Siam; Czecho-Slavonia; Uruguay; Greece; Guatemala; Haiti; Hedjaz; Italy; Japan; Liberia; Nicaragua; Peru; Panama; Poland; Portugal; Roumania.

It will be observed that the British Empire, together with its four "self-governing" colonies and India, which is not self-governing, will have 24 votes and the United States will have four—the same number that Japan or Haiti or Hedjaz or Liberia or Siam will have.

The general conference will meet at the seat of the league of nations, where an "international labor office" will be established "as a part of the organization of the league of nations."

Article 339 provides that "each of the members will [shall] pay the traveling and subsistence expenses of its delegates and their advisers and of its representatives attending the meetings of the conference." There is no method provided whereby this fund shall be raised or through what channel it shall be disbursed. However, the presumption is that each member [nation] agreeing to the treaty and thus becoming a party to that portion of the contract devoted to the International Labor Conference will appropriate funds to meet the expenses.

The governing body of the international labor office is to consist of 24 persons, 12 representing the Governments and 12 representing the employers and the workers—6 each. The 12 latter shall be elected by their respective groups. Of the 12 representing the Governments, 8 shall be "nominated" by the "chief industrial groups in the main conference" and 4 shall be "nominated" by the Governments' delegates. The council of the league of nations shall decide which are the groups "of chief industrial importance." Members of the governing board will hold office for three years. The governing board shall regulate its own procedure and fix its own times of meeting. There is to be a director appointed by the governing board and a staff (no number mentioned) appointed by the director.

We now have (1) a general conference of 128 delegates meeting at least once a year, (2) a governing board of 12 holding office for three years and meeting when and where it pleases, (3) a director of the international labor office with an indeterminate number on his staff. Each of the members will [shall] pay the traveling expenses of the delegates to the conference, members of the governing board, and all advisers. All other expenses of whatever nature "shall be paid to the director by the secretary general of the league of nations out of the general funds of the league."

The functions of the international labor office (controlled by the governing board of 12) shall be the distribution of information "on all subjects relating to the international adjustment of conditions of industrial life and labor and the preparation of the 'agenda' (program) for the meetings of the conference."

The subjects for discussion and consideration by the conference "shall be determined by the governing board." Objections to any subject may be made by any of the members [Governments] but such objections may be overruled by a two-thirds vote of the delegates present in the general conference. After the conference has reached a decision upon any subject a proposal either (1) for legislation or (2) for an international convention may be recommended to the members [Governments] to give it effect. A two-thirds vote is required and "due regard to climate, conditions, and imperfect development" shall be had.

Now comes the vital part of the contract. Each member "undertakes [agrees] that it will within the period of one year at most from the closing of the session of the conference or at the earliest practical moment, and in no case later than 18 months, bring the recommendation before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies for the enactment of legislation or other action." In the case of Federal States, the power of which to enter into conventions on labor matters is subject to limitations, this provision of the agreement is limited to recommendations only, and "in no case shall any member be asked or required to lessen the protection afforded by its existing legislation to the workers concerned." This is good as far as it goes.

In case any member [Government] fails to comply with the recommendations of the conference, an explanation may be required by the general board. If no reply or an inadequate reply is received, the fact may be published for the information of all the members. Any member [nation] may file a complaint against any other member [nation] and the governing board, after such complaint or on its own motion, may institute a commission of inquiry. Each member [nation] agrees to nominate three persons, forming a panel from which the members of the commission of inquiry shall be drawn. The secretary-general of the league of nations shall nominate from this panel the three members of the commission of inquiry. This commission shall make a report indicating among other things "the measure, if any, of an economic character against a defaulting Government which it considers to be appropriate and which it thinks other Governments would be justified in adopting." The secretary-general of the league of nations shall communicate the report to each of the Governments concerned in the complaints. Each Government must decide either to accept the recommendations or refer [appeal] the complaint to a permanent court of international justice to be established. The decision of this court shall be final and the court shall "indicate the measure, if any, of an economic character which it considers to be appropriate." In the event of any member [nation] failing to carry out the recommendation, any other member [nation] may take against the defaulting member [nation] the measures of an economic character indicated in the report of the commission or the decision of the court. These provisions of the treaty are to apply to colonies, protectorates, and possessions "except where local conditions make it impossible or require modifications." All expenses of the first meeting of the labor conference in Washington and originally called for October, 1919, will be borne by the members [nations] "in accordance with the apportionment of the expenses of the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union."

How will this portion of the treaty of peace, providing for an international labor conference, affect America industrially and economically? It is clear that the machinery provided in the contract contemplates the internationalization of all matters "touching the problem of industry and employment," including unions, collective bargaining, strikes, wages, hours of labor, and all kindred subjects. A body of 128 delegates, 64 representing the Governments—presumably politically appointed—32 representing the employers, and 32 representing the work-people, in session at the seat of the league of nations, will have the power to consider and "recommend" what the policy of any member [nation] concerning any problem of industry and employment shall be. In this conference the United States will have 4 votes—4 out of 128.

For example, take the five most vital questions touching industry and employment—wages, unions, closed shops, strikes, and collective bargaining. For a hundred years with a few and never-to-be-forgotten exceptions, the United States has adhered to the policy of protection. The difference between the cost of production in this country and competing countries as a rule has measured the amount of protection accorded. Wages are about 80 per cent of the cost of production, hence wages have been a matter of vital importance. The scale of wages always has been higher in this country than in any other country. Suppose the international labor conference controlled by the members from China, Japan, Brazil, Portugal, New Zealand, Belgium, and perhaps France and Italy decide that the scale of wages in the United States is too low? This might be made an excuse for increasing the cost of production in the United States, thus aiding the commercial rivals of this country in international trade. Suppose the recognition of unions be made an international policy by the labor conference, what would prevent the trades-unions from controlling the industries of the world? Thus the unions of half a dozen European and Asiatic countries might control industry and employment in the United States. Suppose the conference should decide upon the closed shop and recommend it to the different members [nations]? Where would the United States then stand as an industrial Nation? What would become of the American right to work unless all workers joined unions? Suppose the right to collective strikes should be recommended as an international policy. Is the United States ready to legalize collective strikes? Is it prepared to legalize collective bargaining?

True, the conference of 128 delegates sitting at the seat of the league of nations under the contract can only "recommend"; but what follows the failure of any member [nation] to carry out the recommendation? Failure on the part of a member [nation] to obey the recommendation of the conference is followed by (1) publication of the failure, (2) an inquiry by a commission selected by the secretary-general of the league of nations, (3) recommendations of "an economic character" against the defaulting member [nation], (4) appeal by any member [nation] to a court of international justice, followed by a decision indicating still further penalties of an economic character. Is there any doubt but what these economic penalties ultimately will be invoked against a "defaulting" member [nation]?

There appears to be no limit to the power of the proposed International Labor Conference within the broad field of industrial and labor problems. It is conceivable that the industrial supremacy of the United States, the hours of labor, the conditions of labor, the operation and management of industries, both great and small—of railroads, mines, etc.—ultimately might be controlled by the proposed International Labor Conference of 128 members (in which the United States would have only 4 votes) engineered by a governing board of 12, all of whom may be un-American, with its headquarters in Europe, probably at Geneva. It is conceivable that ultimately the control of America's domestic industries and transportation, so far as labor is concerned, might be transferred from Washington and the several State capitals to Geneva or the seat of the league of nations. The possibilities exist and the perils are apparent.

Furthermore, if the contemplated league of nations may use the "economic boycott," the International Labor Conference, an integral part of the league, may do likewise with equal effect. What is meant by an economic boycott? Refusal to trade, a blockade, cutting off supplies of raw material, food, coal, etc. Does America wish to be controlled by a labor conference of 128 men and a governing board of 12 men sitting in Europe? Is the United States prepared to surrender its industrial and economic rights to a coterie of men all but four un-American? Is the United States willing to jeopardize its fiscal and economic policy, its industrial independence, its supremacy? It is unthinkable.

It is argued that such a thing is impossible. Yet it is possible if the treaty of peace is ratified as it is with the provisions of the International Labor Conference intact. The treaty of peace is a contract. The creation of an International Labor Conference is a part of this contract, and the signing of the contract by the representatives of the United States makes binding upon the United States all the provisions, agreements, and undertakings recited therein. They can be enforced as much as any treaty can be enforced, and the United States always has lived and always will live up to its contracts. If the United States signs "on the dotted line," there is no escape from the consequences. Even the good effects of the American protective policy may be nullified.

The leading article in the April, 1919, number of the report of the United States Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, is entitled "Control of labor conditions by international action." The article is by Leifur Magnusson, evidently a gentleman with a foreign ancestry and alien turn of mind. In this article, vouched for by the United States Department of Labor, it is learned that the Socialist Internationale is the present organized expression of the international Socialist movement. It dates back to 1864, when Karl Marx organized the International Workingmen's Association of London. Thus the International Labor Conference, incorporated in the treaty of peace, distinctly is of Socialist origin. The organization was revived in 1889 and held its last meeting in Copenhagen in 1919, where 33 nations were represented. This movement was followed by the International Trades Secretariat, and since 1913 the International Secretariat has been the central executive organ of the International Federation of Labor. Nearly all the members come from European countries and represent collective policies—that is, State capitalism or socialism. As an adjunct to it, the International Association for Labor Legislation was formed in Paris in 1910 for the purpose of promoting treaties touching the movement of labor, emigration, equality of treatment of nationals and aliens, and uniform labor standards.

This is the organization which took advantage of the presence of the peace conference in Paris and succeeded in having attached to the treaty what is known as the "International Labor Conference" section. A program of purely European and socialistic origin was grafted upon a document designed to bring peace between the allied and associated powers on one hand and Germany on the other. To say the least, the process of the granting was novel, if not revolutionary. A commission on international labor legislation, headed by Mr. Samuel Gompers and comprising delegates from Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and Belgium, formulated a report and submitted a program, which was adopted by the peace conference and incorporated in the treaty of peace. Like the covenant of the league of nations, the labor conference is entirely foreign to a treaty of peace with Germany, to negotiate which the conference met at Versailles.

While the program outlined is innocent on its face, the possibilities are revealed, first, in the aims and objects of the European Internationale Socialist Organization—collectivism, destruction of capitalism and the wage system, and the public ownership of industries and utilities; second, in the language used in the labor conference section of the treaty defining the functions of the general conference and the governing board to be the consideration of "all subjects relating to the international adjustment of conditions of industrial life and labor." That is sufficiently comprehensive to meet the views of any socialist or internationalist. There is no question touching the production and distribution of wealth or the policies of nations in solving their own industrial and economic problems which can escape the consideration and "recommendation" of this "International Labor Conference" in which the United States will have 4 votes out of 128, and perhaps no vote at all in the governing board of 24.

Twenty-seven nations (or separate countries), together with four self-governing British colonies and India (not a self-governing colony), will be represented in the general conference. Ten will be European, 7 Asiatic, 7 North American, 6 South American, and 2 African. The British Empire, with her colonies and India, will be represented by 24 delegates, and the 26 other countries (including the United States) will be represented by 4 delegates each. The British Empire will have only 8 less than 25 per cent of the entire membership, while the United States, with more at stake, with a larger industrial population, and with far greater industries, will have 3½ per cent of the entire membership. In voting power the United States will be on a par with Cuba, Guatemala, Honduras, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Roumania, Haiti, Siam, Uruguay, the Croat-Slovene State, Czechoslovakia, and Hejaz.

The idea is preposterous! Think of Hejaz, Siam, Liberia, India, or even China and Japan, voting to determine what the industrial or economic policy of the United States shall be! Think what the power of Great Britain, with her colonies united on an imperial commercial and preferential tariff policy, might be! Labor is a vital factor in the cost of production, and the cost of production in a large measure will control in the future commercial struggle of the world. Suppose Great Britain, France, and Italy, together with Japan, should form an anti-American commercial alliance and with their 36 votes in the international labor conference gain control and seek to force a labor program crippling the United States. With only 4 votes in the conference, what could the United States do? Nothing but submit to the consequences. Suppose the United States refused to carry out the program. An economic boycott would follow. Such possibilities are sufficient to warn patriotic Americans.

Yet it is argued that the aims of the organizations are to raise the labor standards of all other countries to the level of the American standard. Will China and Japan, or even Great Britain, France, and Italy, agree to this? By no means; for that would mean defeat of their plans for a resumption of domination in the trade of the world and the recapture of the markets of the world. In the struggle the tendency will not be to raise the low-standard countries, but to lower the high-standard countries. Water always runs down hill. No international labor conference can be sufficiently strong to embrace in its protecting scope the workmen and workwomen of the world. If American workmen and workwomen think they will improve their condition under international rather than national protection they have a serious disappointment in store for them.

Examination of the labor and industrial conditions of the 32 countries, including the colonies of Great Britain and India, faintly suggests the folly of attempting to protect labor conditions the world over by an international board and the impossibility of trying to raise and make uniform or even approximately uniform the standards of all.

Take the European countries in the proposed labor conference—even the best are low grade compared with the United States, while Greece, Poland, and Portugal are below comparison, and Roumania, the Croat-Slovene State, and Czechoslovakia are out of consideration. Take the Asiatic countries—Japan, China, Siam, India, and Hedjaz are either cheap-labor countries or slave countries. Australia and New Zealand would do Great Britain's bidding. In North America Canada would follow Great Britain's lead, while the countries south to Panama are low-wage or practically peon countries. All the countries in South America are low-wage countries, mostly agricultural, and all more or less backward. Even in Brazil, one of the most advanced countries in South America, out of a population of 17,000,000 more than 80 per cent can neither read nor write. In this international hopper the tendency will be to drag down the high-grade countries, not lift up the low-grade countries. If the dreams of the international labor conference are to be realized even partially, the burden must rest on the high-grade countries. With its 4 votes, what can the United States do toward solving this tremendous problem?

The proposed covenant of the league of nations contains no greater dangers to the United States than the proposed International Labor Conference. Amendments and reservations to the covenant intended to safeguard the sovereignty and political independence of this country will not reach the dangers nor cure the defects of the international labor conference. Giving the United States the same number of votes in the league assembly and council that Great Britain will have and explaining or altering article 10 of the covenant and the section referring to the Monroe doctrine, will have no effect on the labor conference. Great Britain will have 24 votes and the United States will have 4 in that organization. The powers, liabilities, and responsibilities of the general conference and the governing body will remain as before. To remedy defects and avoid dangers, the whole matter of representation and the powers and functions of the general labor conference should be revised.

Why should this wonderful Nation enter into a solemn agreement giving 31 other countries or colonies, all anti-American and more or less envious of America's powers and independence, an opportunity to determine her labor, industrial, or economic policy?

Why should this Republic of ours, in which a policy of protection has promoted the interests of labor and capital alike, be jeopardized by an organization whose aim is "the removal so far as possible of all economic barriers" and the employment of the economic boycott to destroy those barriers? Why should America place in the hands of those bent on undermining her institutions weapons to accomplish that purpose? Why should America, whose corner stone is independence and whose structure is founded on nationalism, surrender that independence and substitute internationalism? Such a course would be madness. Such an undertaking would be national suicide.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this concludes for the present my comments upon the labor articles of the league.

I suggest the absence of a quorum. That is usually the proper suggestion to make at the end of an address in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARDING in the chair). The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Hale	McCumber	Simmons

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], is detained from the Senate by illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to strike out Part XIII.

Mr. THOMAS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I want to say a word in consideration of this amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, and of the reservation offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], a word bearing upon not only that part of the treaty which the amendment seeks to eliminate, but upon the circumstances under which the so-called labor provision seems to have been prepared.

It has been asserted during the course of this debate, and, of course, without denial, that representatives of America at the conference in Paris were few, while the representatives of the European powers were many. It has been argued that in a political sense our interests were very different from those of the other great powers party to this conference; that even the development of communications, the development of industrial civilization on this Continent, had not made our interests so germane to those of Europe and Asia that we were warranted in entering into a political compact like the covenant of the league, or the treaty of peace exclusive of the covenant of the league.

I venture, Mr. President, that this is nowhere more manifest than the attempt under Part XIII of the treaty to erect an international legislature intended to deal with the problems of labor. If there had been opportunity for America to study its own interests—and even assuming that American interests could be served by the creation of such a legislature as is contemplated under Part XIII—the American delegates in Paris never would have agreed that this economic-labor legislature should not consider the greatest of American productive interests.

I have hurriedly assembled some figures bearing upon the relative production of agriculture and manufacture in America, because among the great powers, excluding Russia, America alone is still an agricultural country in the commonly accepted meaning of the term. If my memory serves me, it is now held that the number of persons enrolled in the ranks of organized labor is 4,000,000, or twice the number enrolled before the outbreak of the war. As far back as 1910, the number of persons engaged in agricultural occupations, according to the census of the United States, was 12,500,000, and yet there is no especial provision in all the long pages of this treaty for the protection or consideration of agriculture, the most important of American industries. It was natural that the other powers, which primarily are manufacturing and secondarily are agricultural countries, should ignore agriculture, either deliberately or merely in the futherance of their more important interests; but it was not natural, nor in the interests of this country, that agriculture should have been ignored by the delegates of the United States at Paris.

The last table of agricultural production which I have been able to find was one in a recent number of the Journal of Commerce of New York, which places at twenty-four billions a year the current value of agricultural production of the United States, three times its value in 1910.

The aggregate value of exports from this country is about five times what it was in 1913, based upon the last months for which figures are available. It is impossible to believe that conditions of agricultural production and agricultural export will not be affected by conditions in the labor market. That palpably was the judgment of the farmers' conventions which sat last week and the week before in Maryland and at Kansas City, in Missouri. There is no Senator who is familiar, either through his own experience or through advices from his constituents, with conditions of production on the farm to-day who does not realize how closely interwoven they are with conditions of production in other industries and with labor conditions even remote from the farm. Yet there is no provision that agriculture shall be represented in this international legislature, which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on the one hand by amendment and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] on the other hand by reservation would make inoperative upon the United States.

It is not possible that during this generation the representatives of any of the European powers east of Roumania and of Poland would have any identity of economic interest with the United States in the matter of agriculture.

Those are food-importing countries. It is to their interest to take such measures as they may to secure conditions of production, of import into Europe, and as will depreciate the value of the products to the American farmer. We have no right to quarrel with them on that score. They may seek to buy food for their operatives in the cheapest possible market of the world.

The other agricultural countries competitive with the United States in the export of foodstuffs are not industrial competitors of the United States as are the European powers which will be buying foodstuffs in the markets of the world. Russia, when she finds herself, Roumania, the Argentine, Brazil are producers and exporters of foodstuffs, but are not industrial producers in any modern sense of the word. How completely, then, the interests of these nonindustrial and exclusively agricultural countries coincide with the interests of those industrial countries of Europe which can not hope to produce foodstuffs enough for their own populations.

It has been said time and again in the course of this debate that the assembly and the council of the league would have a political rather than a judicial character. If that be true of either of those bodies, it is already manifest, from the deliberations of the international labor legislature now sitting in conference here in Washington, that the labor legislature will have a political character even more certainly than the assembly or the council. We all know from our own experience what is called logrolling by those who criticize Congress or the legislatures of the States or conventions, political or otherwise. We know that such logrolling is a union of interest between certain elements and often to the disadvantage of other elements in the convention.

I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], whose proposed reservation I have before me, will remember, as I do, that during a long-drawn-out consideration and debate on a tariff bill two great areas of the country, without other economic interests in common, united in writing a wool schedule into that tariff bill. The great herdsmen whose flocks add to the wealth of his own and other States in the West joined with the mill owners whose mills are situate along the Atlantic seaboard. There was a great hue and cry on the part of the ultimate consumers, who felt that they were being assessed in the interest of the sheep owners and mill owners.

No one who has considered the composition of this supreme international labor legislature or who has read casually the newspaper accounts of its deliberations can doubt that already an instinctive union of certain economic interests is at work.

There is already before the labor legislature which is sitting in Washington a resolution to consider the problem of unemployment and a proposal to make employment compulsory. In itself such a proposal may be ominous of legislation to be submitted to the parliaments of the world to conscript or impress the workers of the world, but if we turn back to the period when the projects embodied in Part XIII of the treaty were under discussion, we can recall that among the natural means suggested to mitigate the dangers of fluctuating unemployment was a free market for labor, to be secured through the abrogation by international decree of all limitations upon emigration or immigration. The most conspicuous of the delegates in Paris who proposed this absolute abolition of all restraint upon immigration was George Nichol Barnes, minister without portfolio in the British cabinet, representing the British labor interests, the same Mr. Barnes to whom the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] referred in his exhaustive analysis of Part XIII, the Mr. Barnes upon whose motion the American proposal for the abolition of slavery was voted down.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a statement?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I do not wish to disturb the continuity of his very excellent presentation of the matter. Has it occurred to the Senator that there is nothing in the treaty that is more destructive of nationalism—if there is any part that is destructive of nationalism—than Part XIII? I have attempted to analyze Part XIII and to comprehend its full significance——

Mr. McCORMICK. If the Senator has succeeded in that regard, he has done more, perhaps, than any other Senator in the Chamber.

Mr. KING. I wish to assure the Senator that my mental capacity has its limitations, and I have not been able to understand its implications and its limitations and its far-reaching consequences; but, as I have analyzed it, it seems to me that Part XIII will tend to destroy nationalism, will tend to the promulgation and the establishment of internationalism, will be hurtful to American labor, and will not conduce to the world's peace.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the Senator has very wisely remarked that of all the provisions calculated to break down nationalism this will go further than any other, because the powers which it proposes to delegate to the superstate through the medium of this labor congress are more penetrating in their effect than any of those which can be exercised immediately by the assembly or the council of the league, whatever powers the assembly or the council presently may draw to itself.

It is precisely on that point that Mr. Barnes, in my judgment, acted, for after all British merchant shipping, in the prosperity of which he has a great and patriotic interest, is largely manned by Lascar seamen, natives of the Indian Empire, paid an oriental wage. You may argue that the seamen's act, which we owe to the resolution and statesmanship of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], will meet that condition. It will meet that condition for any labor not oriental, but until the day when the policy of oriental exclusion in this country is broken down by international dictum the seamen's act can not meet the competition of the oriental seafaring men.

Mr. Barnes, as I said, was the most conspicuous of those who proposed the abrogation of all restraint on immigration. But he was not alone in sustaining that view. The Italian Government very naturally shared his opinion. The export of labor is one of the items upon which the Italian minister of finance always and publicly relies in the preparation of his budget. The British minister for labor and the Italian Government, since the assembly of the conference in Paris, have avowed their judgment that emigration should be without let or hindrance. At this date the Governments of the Balkan States have not spoken on the subject, but any student of immigration to America during the last few years, any student however superficial, knows that before the war it was from the Balkan States that came the growing stream of unskilled labor.

The Japanese position in this regard need not be argued here. Testimony to the intention of the Japanese Government, to the dangers to American labor implied in that intention, has been given by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], who nevertheless is going to support this project to internationalize the labor of the world.

All of the countries whose populations exceed their ability to support them, either through the product of their own fields or through the organized industry which depends largely upon the importation of raw materials, must instinctively unite on a common policy to make easy the emigration of labor to fields where employment is open on terms better than those obtained at home.

How is it, then, with the other countries which receive immigrants? Is their view like ours and is their interest identical with ours? At the outset of my remarks I pointed out that they were primarily agricultural countries, either without the natural resources which make for manufacture or with those resources so little developed that it will be a generation and more before they enter the competitive field of manufacturing industry. The Argentine and Brazil are in point. Here are fine, vigorous, ambitious, growing agricultural countries seeking immigrants not for the exploitation of their industries, not to develop mines or to supply hands for factories, not to act as wage competitors in those industries where the wage cost, in the judgment of the employer, threatens economic production, but seeking immigrants for settlement on the farms. Not only have they no economic impulse to restrict or to prevent such immigration but they have every reason to encourage immigration. In past years they have maintained agencies in Europe for the purpose of encouraging the stream of immigration across the south Atlantic. Aye, in other South American countries, as well as in Brazil, there has been no objection even to oriental settlement.

See now how the interest of American labor and agriculture is going to be ringed about by the opposing interests of the other countries: First, by the community of interest between countries preponderantly industrial and exclusively agricultural as against one great country, the United States, which economically is self-contained, and which, therefore, is the competitor of the agricultural exporters on the one hand and of the exporters of manufactures on the other; in the second place, by the countries whose surplus population seeks an outlet through emigration and so are bound to these other powers not interested to restrict the volume of immigration but to encourage it.

The total number of States which will sit in this labor legislature will be 46 in all; 184 delegates will be assembled there; 24 representatives of the British Empire, 16 more representing its feudatory States, or 40 in all; and 4 for the United States. What other power will be moved by an economic interest identical with our own or so complementary to it as to join us in maintaining the position which we hold, either regarding the flow of immigration or the policy of the world toward agricultural production?

This scheme, as I have said, was devised without any due consideration of the economic position of the United States and of its great agricultural interests with reference to principal competitors, either industrial or agricultural. The scheme, Mr. President, was devised in a moment of spiritual exaltation and nebulous aspiration, eloquently voiced by a distinguished philosopher, unadvised by any economist or hard-headed business men to represent the economic interest of America. It is that very obliviousness of actualities which has brought the country into the grave economic straits in which it finds itself to-day.

Before I conclude I wish to allude to the point of view which guided our Government in facing our domestic industrial problems, for the light which that point of view throws on the want of practical foresight and judgment in dealing with our economic interests abroad. When I say that I do not profess to be a business man, although I believe I think in the terms which are common to the run of us, moved by the instinct to which Kipling alluded when he said of the American's readiness to turn "to the instant need of things" at home.

In his address of December 2 of last year the President spoke as follows:

> So far as our domestic affairs are concerned, the problem of our return to peace is a problem of economic and industrial readjustment.

That, I think, is a truism which none would deny, and which some of us would have taken more seriously than the distinguished speaker himself ever did.

> The problem of our return to peace is a problem of economic and industrial readjustment. That problem is less serious for us than it may turn out to be for the nations which have suffered the disarrangements and the losses of war longer than we.

That is to say, our economic constitution is so rugged that it may stand a siege of industrial disease without care and still survive. That means that the average well-being of the American workman is so high that we may ignore the difficulties of industrial readjustment and permit him to suffer from a long period of unemployment, knowing that he will not actually starve to death during that time.

> Our people, moreover, do not wait to be coached and led. They know their own business, are quick and resourceful at every readjustment, definite in purpose, and self-reliant in action.

That is all very true; nobody denies it; and yet it does not point the way toward the transition between the industrial condition in which the country was placed by the war and the condition to which we would return it.

> Any leading strings we might seek to put them in would speedily become hopelessly tangled, because they would pay no attention to them and go their own way.

Mr. President, the administration cut some of the leading strings and left the others drawn taut, with the confusing consequences which such unequal pressure must inevitably bring upon the industrial body of the country.

> All that we can do as their legislative and executive servants is to mediate the process of change here, there, and elsewhere as we may. I have heard much counsel as to the plans that should be formed and personally conducted to a happy consummation, but from no quarter have I seen any general scheme of "reconstruction" emerge which I thought it likely we could force our spirited business men and self-reliant laborers to accept with due pliancy and obedience.

Perhaps if the Government had been more actively concerned with industrial readjustments at home and less concerned with political readjustments in Europe, it would not have been necessary to call upon force at this time.

> The moment we knew the armistice to have been signed we took the harness off. Raw materials upon which the Government had kept its hand for fear there should not be enough for the industries that supplied the armies have been released and put into the general market again. Great industrial plants whose whole output and machinery had been taken over for the uses of the Government have been set free to return to the uses to which they were put before the war.

And now comes a very interesting sentence:

> It has not been possible to remove so readily or so quickly the control of foodstuffs and of shipping, because the world has still to be fed from our granaries and the ships are still needed to send supplies to our men overseas and to bring the men back as fast as the disturbed conditions on the other side of the water permit; but even there restraints are being relaxed as much as possible and more and more as the weeks go by.

It was a very short time before all restraint was relaxed, with the results that we now have, with the result that after the mounting cost of foodstuffs had evoked protest from every quarter of the country the moral and legal powers of the Government were belatedly and suddenly invoked, and here again the agricultural interests of America were of no concern to those in high place. After the farmer had raised his crops, had fattened his swine and his cattle, while everything that he bought was at the top of the market, a tremendous and effective effort was made to depress the value of his product, and that of no one else, so that 30 and 40 per cent of the value of some of the products of the farm was wiped out in six weeks.

The message from which I have been quoting made two recommendations, neither of which is likely to be carried out, both based on the assumption that there would continue for a long period a surplus of labor in this country; both based on the assumption that means must be found, not to increase production in the normal channels, but to find employment by abnormal methods.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. Before the Senator from Illinois leaves the discussion of agricultural products I want to suggest that a new policy has been instituted in our country that developed during the hearings before the Agricultural Committee the other day.

It seems that this country had from three hundred to three hundred and fifty million bushels of wheat to export, but in the face of that an embargo was placed upon those products; and when the neutral nations of the world applied to us for our products they were told that no permit would be issued to them, so they were sent to Argentina and other places. When the man in charge of this tremendous business was asked why these orders were not filled and why this product was not sold, he made the excuse that he thought the Allies were entitled to first consideration. The facts are, however, that we had at least 300,000,000 bushels to spare besides what we might furnish to the Allies.

I simply wanted to suggest to the Senator that it seems that this policy has been adopted, and we seem to have formed an association with those we call our allies, and, regardless of whether it is going to benefit the American people or is going to be detrimental to them, the policy adopted is being pursued. The Senator from Illinois said a moment ago that he was not a business man; but from his talk I do not believe that he would have pursued a policy such as I have suggested—to refuse the orders which came from the allied nations of the world, when we not only had enough for our own people but had hundreds of millions of bushels to spare. Does the Senator from Illinois think that it is wise in the interest of labor, in the interest of agriculture, and in the interest of the consuming public to carry on that policy?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, this scheme of uneconomic altruism, blind to the actualities and deaf to the facts, by which our delegation seems to have been moved, has done the American farmer some hurt in the sense of which the Senator speaks; but it will find its splendid fruition in the mandate for the Turkish Empire, which I read in the great administration organ, the New York Times, will take for its consummation 20 years' time, 50,000 American troops, and a billion dollars. I see that it is proposed by the editor of the Paris Matin that one of Mr. Morgan's partners shall be made the viceroy of Constantinople, an appropriate appointment under a mandate conceived as this one was conceived.

But, Mr. President, the disregard for the actualities arising out of the war, the ignorance of economic exigencies at home, which has found its fruit in strikes on every side, in industrial disorder everywhere, and in an unequal reduction in costs which has borne on one group of the community and on none other—this ignorance of American necessities tolerated the creation of this fantastic labor legislature of the world.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is desirous of addressing the Senate upon the question raised by the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to what are known as the labor articles. He has been detained at home by illness and will be unable to go on until to-morrow. I make the request, therefore, that this amendment may go over until to-morrow, with an agreement that it shall be voted upon at 3 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator what will be done meanwhile?

Mr. LODGE. It is my intention to offer an amendment, of which I gave notice, to strike out the Shantung articles, instead of the previous amendment or series of amendments from the committee, which, as the Senator is aware, proposed to strike out the word "Japan" and insert the word "China." I shall not discuss the amendment. I simply want a vote upon it. Then there is an amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. Those are the only amendments that remain. If this agreement is entered into, we will dispose of the labor amendment to-morrow at 3 o'clock, and I shall then ask the Senate to consider the reservations.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, perhaps I ought to say, in view of the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, that I think I will offer an amendment, before the amendments are finally all disposed of, to strike out article 10 of the covenant; but I am not going to detain the Senate a great while in the presentation of the amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator from Massachusetts think that we can dispose this afternoon of the two amendments to which he refers?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think the Shantung amendment ought to take a longer time than to call the roll. The subject has been fully discussed. How much discussion will arise on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma I can not say, but I should hope to dispose of that and the amendment suggested by the Senator from Idaho this afternoon, and I hope the Senate will remain in session for that purpose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The unanimous-consent agreement, then, is limited to a vote upon the La Follette amendment to-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; that was my request; and I hope to dispose of the other amendments before that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside what is known as the La Follette amendment, with an agreement that the same shall be voted upon at not later than 3 o'clock upon the calendar day of to-morrow, November 5. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LODGE. Now, I move the amendment of which I gave notice. I do not desire to debate it myself; I simply desire a vote. I move to strike out articles 156, 157, and 158, the Shantung articles. The motion is simply to strike them out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to strike out articles 156, 157, and 158.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). I have a general pair on this subject with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and am therefore compelled to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. KIRBY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], and vote "nay."

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). My colleague, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, is detained on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. If my colleague were here and allowed to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], and as he is absent I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). May I inquire if the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a pair with that Senator, and in his absence I am not at liberty to vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote. I voted inadvertently, thinking he had voted.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I observe that my pair, the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am paired with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and in his absence withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I have already voted, but I have discovered that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily absent from the Senate to-day, and having a general pair with that Senator, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the affirmative). I have already cast a vote in the affirmative, but I note the absence of the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with whom I have a general pair. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the affirmative). I inadvertently voted, but the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is absent to-day on account of illness, and as I promised to take care of him during his absence, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], who is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE].

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] are detained by illness. The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] are absent on public business. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], both of whom are absent. If the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "yea," and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] would vote "nay."

I have also been requested to announce that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is in Massachusetts to vote in the State elections.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 41, as follows:

So Mr. LODGE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has been offered, and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has given notice of an amendment which he desires to offer.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is not ready to proceed just now.

Mr. GORE. I prefer, if the Senator from Idaho can do so, that he shall proceed with his amendment. I do not know that I will care to discuss my proposed amendment at all, but I should like to have a little while before action upon it.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that there is any difference as to which precedes the other in its fate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho formally tender the amendment now?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I move to strike out article 10 of the so-called covenant of the league of nations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, article 10 of the covenant of the league reads as follows:

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

As has been stated heretofore, and it may be repeated perhaps for the purpose of recalling it to our memory, this provision has two distinct parts. The first is a primary obligation which rests upon the members of the league. The second proposition is that provision which simply has to do with the advice of the council as to the means by which the primary obligation shall be fulfilled.

There has been reported to the Senate by the Committee on Foreign Relations a reservation on article 10, but I am impelled to offer the amendment which I do for the reason that the reservation does not, in my judgment, meet the situation; certainly not as I feel that it ought to be met. This is the proposed reservation:

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

I think a close analysis will show that this reservation does not change the situation at all. It leaves intact, in my opinion, the obligation under article 10. It does not, in fact, modify the obligation. It seems to have for its purpose the transfer from the executive department to the Congress of the power of advice with reference to the manner of executing or carrying into effect the obligation in article 10. It says:

Unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

"So provide" must relate, I presume, to the employment of the military forces for the purpose of carrying into effect article 10.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in just a moment. If the reservation has any effect at all, its effect is that the military forces shall not be used to carry into effect the obligation until Congress acts upon it, thereby reserving to Congress apparently the power to say whether or not the military forces shall be used in a particular instance, but in no wise modifying or changing the primary obligation that we shall preserve and protect the territorial integrity of all members of the league, but consulting another body of our Government as to when and how we shall do it.

I now yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator concede that the reference to the employment of the military forces is merely a recital in the reservation, and that it is an obligation which is not assumed unless in a particular case Congress shall assume it?

Mr. BORAH. Is that the construction which the Senator places upon it?

Mr. LENROOT. It is.

Mr. BORAH. Let us read it and see. It is encouraging if that is the construction. I read it again:

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war and authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

Does the Senator understand that the words "so provide" mean that they shall protect the territorial integrity or political independence of another country?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; that we may assume that obligation in a particular case.

Mr. BORAH. Then the language is most unfortunate in its use. The words "so provide" may relate back to the words "or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under article 10" quite as well and far more aptly than to the question of "territorial integrity or political independence."

Mr. LENROOT. Instead of the words "so provide," had there been inserted, as originally was inserted, "shall assume such obligation," I do not believe the Senator would question its purpose.

Mr. BORAH. I think that would be better; but it is an awkward expression to say that you shall not assume this obligation with reference to protecting the territorial integrity and political independence of other nations until Congress shall "so provide." And it is all made ambiguous by the fact that there is the other proposition of the use of the military forces, united by a disjunctive, with the obligation to protect territorial integrity.

Mr. LENROOT. In a particular case?

Mr. BORAH. In a particular case. The interpolation put in between the two clauses as to when the use of the military forces may be had has no place in there at all.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator will see that is merely a recital.

Mr. BORAH. It should be stricken out. It should read as follows:

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, unless in any particular case the Congress shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

If the reservation can be so modified as to speak unmistakably to the proposition that the obligation under article 10 shall not be assumed in any instance until in a particular case which is presented to the Congress the Congress shall indorse it or undertake to carry it out, of course, that is a different proposition entirely from what I conceive the reservation now states. As the reservation is worded, in my judgment it would be interpreted and could be interpreted to mean nothing more than the advice of Congress as to the use of the military or naval forces in a particular instance in which we were called upon to carry out the obligation.

Mr. President, the Congress can not limit the power of the Commander in Chief in the use of the Army and Navy unless there is involved in the question that of a declaration of war. In other words, if we enter into this league and become a member of the league and a party to the treaty, the President of the United States as Commander in Chief would have as much right under the league to send 100,000 men to Silesia for the purpose of policing the situation and preserving peace as he would have a right to send them to Texas. We can refuse to raise an Army, we can refuse to provide a Navy, we can make rules and regulations for the mere government of the Army or the Navy, but we can not intrench upon the right of the Commander in Chief to command the Army and to command the Navy. We can not say that the Army or part of it shall be stationed here and another part of it shall be stationed there, or that it shall be utilized in time of peace at this particular point and at another point upon another occasion. We can not issue the orders which belong to the Commander in Chief. And if this treaty becomes a binding obligation it will be the duty of the Executive to execute in so far as execution rests upon us and as Commander in Chief of the Army.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment. If my construction of this is correct, and it is permitted to stand in that way, Congress would never have any authority under this treaty to act until the question of a declaration of war was involved.

I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator from Idaho think that the Commander in Chief of the Army, without a declaration of war, has the right to send the soldiers of the United States out of the United States into other countries to participate in any character of work?

Mr. BORAH. If we have the authority to make the treaty, then I would have no doubt about it, Mr. President. If the league is a body that we can enter at all, if we have the power to create the league, if it belongs to our delegated power at all to provide that we shall be a member of a council or assembly which has to do with the preservation of the peace of the world, I would have no doubt that the Commander in Chief could send the Army, or any portion, to any part of the world—for the territorial jurisdiction of this league is the world—for the purpose of preserving peace or of policing the situation.

By what authority is our Army in Russia to-day? What is it doing there? How did it get there and how is it maintained? Suppose, Mr. President, that the President should send 100,000 men to Silesia, what would we do about it as a Congress?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose there were no treaty at all and the President should send a hundred thousand men to Silesia, what would Congress do about it?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know of anything except impeachment.

Mr. LENROOT. But could we impeach him for executing the solemn provisions of a treaty? If we have power to make it, has he not power to execute it? I think that is true. So it is immaterial, if we assume no obligation, whether it is under a treaty or without a treaty.

Mr. BORAH. But I am assuming now that we have created the league; that we have the power under the Constitution to create the league; that we are a member of the league; that the jurisdiction of the league is the world; and that its authority is to preserve peace. If we have authority to create the league, then certainly the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy has the authority to operate anywhere within the jurisdiction of the league or under its authority.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Perhaps the Senator from Idaho and I would disagree upon that. I should say that was not so, unless there was something in the league which entailed an obligation upon us to take such action.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, there is something in the league that entails that obligation.

Mr. LENROOT. There is now; but, of course, with the reservation there would not be.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes; the obligations will all be there after the reservations are adopted. We have been consoling ourselves with the idea that we were making radical changes in the covenant, but outside of the reservation which has to do with the withdrawal, in my judgment, the league will be just, in its practical workings, the same after the reservations are adopted as it was before.

Let me call your attention to the fact that when the league is organized, even if we adopt reservations, we shall be members of it. Our delegate will be sitting at Geneva; he will be the accredited representative of this Republic. The council under the league has jurisdiction of all questions coming under the league or which relate to the peace of the world. We have delegated our representative to sit and deal with those questions. Have we the authority to delegate him? Have we authority to give him that jurisdiction? If we have the authority to delegate him and have the authority to give him that jurisdiction, can not he bind the people whom he represents? What is all this about if that is not true? Is this man shorn of his power by reason of the fact that the Constitution does not authorize us to do this? If the Constitution does authorize us to do it, then certainly he has the authority to bind us; he has authority to do anything, in conjunction with his associates, which has to do with the preservation of the peace of the world. If the council decides that it is necessary to send 500,000 men to Manchuria, not for war, not to carry on war, but to prevent war, to preserve peace, to police the situation, has not the Commander in Chief the authority to take such action? He has, if we have any authority at all to create the league. I do not say the Commander in Chief would be compelled to take such action; it is not necessary to go that far, although there is where logic carries us. But I do say that if the council, of which we are a member, decides that it is necessary to preserve peace that we should send 100,000 men to Silesia, the President could do so without subjecting himself to the charge of usurpation or liability to impeachment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Idaho has about answered the question I was on the point of asking. His contention is that under section 10, if the obligation is assumed, it requires no action by Congress to send troops throughout the world to comply with the obligation, but that the President can send them without waiting for action by Congress?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the President says, "I am sending these troops for the purpose of preserving peace, for the purpose of policing the situation, for the purpose of preventing war," what right has Congress to call him to account for it? We have given him the authority to appoint our representatives; we have created the league; we have given it the jurisdiction; we have given it the authority; and he is our Commander in Chief.

I said a few moments ago that if the President should send troops without the authority of the treaty and without the authority of the covenant, in my judgment he would be subject to impeachment; I have no doubt about that; but when we enter into a treaty—assuming that we have the power to do so—and when we create a league—assuming that we have the power to do so—sanctify it with legal authority, and become a party to a supergovernment which has to do with the peace of the world, what is the difference between sending 100,000 troops to Silesia and sending 50,000 troops to the coal fields in Illinois? Who shall say that the President has not the authority to do so?

Mr. President, I am debating this question now upon the theory that the proposed reservation will remain as it is. I concede that if the change which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] suggests is made it will be very much better.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I did not suggest a change; I merely suggested language that may mean the same thing, and I merely suggested that language in order to make clear my construction of it.

Mr. BORAH. Well, on the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin, I will suggest a change when we get to it.

Mr. Pomeroy says:

> Congress raises and supplies armies and navies and makes rules for their government, and there its power and its duty end. The additional power of the President as supreme commander is independent and absolute.

Up until the time that we propose to wage war the President has a perfect right to use the Army as Commander in Chief for the purpose of preserving peace, and after war is declared Congress can take no action which will infringe upon the right of the Commander in Chief to command. Our fathers were very careful about that when they wrote the Constitution, because they had some experience with Congress commanding, or trying to command, the forces under Gen. Washington.

> The legislative powers which relate to raising, equipping, supplying, and governing the land and naval forces have nothing in common with the separate and distinct function of commanding those forces. No particular statutes passed under the former class of attributes can interfere with the President in his exercise of the latter. Even the general clause of Article I, section 8 (par. 18), which authorizes Congress to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers conferred upon any department of the Government, can not permit the Congress to assume the capacities and duties of Commander in Chief. * * * He commands the Army and Navy; Congress does not. He may make all disposition of troops and officers, stationing them now at this post, now at that; he may send out naval vessels to such parts of the world as he pleases—he may distribute the arms, ammunition, and supplies in such quantities and at such arsenals and depositories as he deems best.

Now, we are a member of the supergovernment. Article 4 provides what the authority of this supergovernment shall be with reference to this particular question:

The council may deal at its meeting with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

That is a rather wide-reaching territorial jurisdiction, because it includes the whole world, regardless of membership in the league.

There is no place upon this mundane sphere where the league may not pry into conditions and put into operation its undefined and unlimited powers.

What may it do? Having for its territorial jurisdiction the world, it may do anything; it has jurisdiction of anything which affects the peace of the world. Suppose that the council is sitting in session and decides that the condition of affairs in the Far East is such as to threaten the peace of the world. War has not been begun; the council is desirous of preventing war; and suppose the council, with our member sitting with them, decides that it is necessary in order to preserve peace to send 500,000 troops to Mongolia or Manchuria; suppose that it decides that our portion of the 500,000 troops is 100,000 men, and that word comes to the Commander in Chief that this is for the purpose of policing the situation as we are policing the situation in Illinois and other places; and the President of the United States sends 100,000 troops to Manchuria; is there anything in the reservations or in the league covenant which you can point to the President and say "You have no authority to do it"? If you can point to no provision and no authority as expressed in the league prohibiting such action, upon what ground can you challenge the authority of the President for his action? Suppose you point to your reservation and say that the troops are not to be used without the authority of Congress, what will the President say? The President will say, "Under the Constitution of the United States I am the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy; I am not carrying on war; I do not intend to carry on war; I am preventing war just the same as I am in Russia now or in Illinois." He would cite you to the Constitution, which makes him the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. You have raised the Army, you have equipped it, you have given him the munitions, and he can station them in Manchuria just the same as he can station them in New Mexico. Remember, my friends, that after this league is formed there is no foreign territory so far as the league is concerned. We are not then encroaching upon foreign territory so far as the league is concerned. It is all within the compass and jurisdiction of the league, whether it is the North Pole or the South Pole.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator think that even if article 10 is stricken out, and the council of the league left with authority to advise the use of troops, the President would be authorized to use the Army of the United States, so far as there was an Army, and send it to foreign countries to participate in carrying out the recommendations of the council?

In asking that question I do not mean to indicate an opinion to the contrary. I ask it because I desire to hear the Senator discuss it.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has gone to the heart of this whole proposition, and he has touched upon a question which the reservationists have been careful to avoid.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will say, for myself, that I am opposed to allowing our troops to be sent abroad except on specific action by Congress in each particular case.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has gone to the heart of this entire controversy, and has touched a question which in my humble judgment is not touched by the reservations at all. Until you limit the jurisdiction and the authority of the council and the assembly as to what they shall be authorized to do, I do not see how you are going to be in a position to object to the action of the President in complying with the request of our member who sits in that council.

Reflect upon the situation in which we would be, and let us reflect upon our position as it would appear before the world, in case they were attempting to put into operation the powers of the council. May I go over that in part again, in view of the Senator's question?

We will assume that the council is in session at Geneva, and there sit nine men, all of them accredited representatives of their governments, and presumably accredited by legal authority and by constitutional power. A question arises in the Far East or in the Near East—we will say, for better illustration, perhaps, in the Balkans—and the council sits in judgment upon that situation.

Our member takes part with the rest of them, and finally they sign a program and announce it to the world as the method by which the league is to preserve peace. That is its primary obligation and purpose of being in existence. Remember, the representative of the United States is a duly accredited representative, and we are assuming, for the purpose of this argument, that under the Constitution we have a right to create the league and to send him, and that the council decides that the United States shall furnish 100,000 men as its proportion for the purpose of policing the situation in the Balkans and preventing war. Upon what theory would we object to sending them?

Will some man rise and say then, "Aye, but we have a peculiar form of government. One department checks another department, and the Executive can not send troops until he is authorized by Congress"?

Passing, now, the legal proposition, which I will come to later, let us see what position we would be in when we raised that question in Congress. Would we be in a position to raise that question after we had gone to the council and sat in judgment upon the question? Could we be heard before the world to say that notwithstanding our duly accredited representative decided that it was our duty to send 100,000 men we would fall back behind some provision or supposed provision of our Constitution and refuse to send them? If we did we would not only forfeit our respect at home, but we would forfeit our honor and our standing with every nation in the world.

Mind you, we have not undertaken to limit the jurisdiction of our representative. We have not undertaken to limit the jurisdiction of the league. We sign the league without anything of that kind. We have not undertaken to say that before he shall act he shall report back to Congress, and the Congress shall decide whether or not we shall be bound. We have given him authority and he has exercised it, and under every conceivable moral obligation we must carry it out.

Mr. President, if the authority of the assembly and the council is not limited, if their jurisdictions are not curtailed, if they are not restrained in power, any reservation outside of that, in my judgment, is wholly ineffective.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is perfectly competent for the Congress to limit the American representative on the council, to limit and restrict his powers, to require him to get authority from the Congress before voting on certain subjects. There is no difficulty about that. That is entirely a domestic question. Other nations can limit the authority of their own representatives as they please. Why does the Senator assume that our representative there is to have an unlimited and autocratic power?

Mr. BORAH. I will tell the Senator why. This covenant, which creates our relationship with the other nations of the world, says that the council may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world—not that Congress may deal with it, not that a representative of this country shall hear the facts and report back, but that the council may deal with it; that constitutes an unrestrained authority. I take the position that if you permit this covenant to go out as your contract with the other nations of the world you must carry it out in letter and in spirit, or you will forfeit your standing with the other nations of the world. Does the Senator now say that we shall protect ourselves by passing a law here at home to the effect that our member of the council shall not deal with matters affecting the league or the peace of the world, and that Congress shall deal with those things, and send him there merely to record his vote? If he means that, that is not what is written in the covenant.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I say that the American representative on the council is under the absolute control of the legislative authority of the United States, and that the Congress may and, in my opinion, should enact a law defining his powers; and I think it ought to define those powers so as to require him to get authority before casting his vote upon any occasion when it would require the use of the military or naval forces of the United States.

I see no difficulty about that. It is purely a domestic question. Each nation can empower its own representative as it sees fit; and I can not see why the Senator makes the point that the American representative is to be an autocrat and not responsive to the authority of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. He is not an autocrat. He is exercising authority which we, after six months of deliberation, have given him, and that is to deal with all matters within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; we have as yet given him no authority.

Mr. BORAH. I trust we never shall.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When he is appointed the Congress can, with perfect competence and propriety, define his powers and limit his authority, and I believe it ought to do it.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, the position of the Senator from Nebraska is entirely satisfactory to me; and when a reservation is offered here to limit the power of this council to that of a mere amanuensis of the different parliaments and congresses, I trust that the Senator and I will be found together upon that proposition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a different proposition. My position is that it is a domestic question; it is for us to regulate, and not for us to make a treaty with some other country about regulating it. Let them do as they please; let them authorize their representatives to act without any authority, to have no restrictions, but on our part let us, as a republic, define the authority and the powers of our representatives.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. Suppose that the President of the United States were to decide to act as a member of the council, in his own name and by his own proper authority——

Mr. BORAH. Or person.

Mr. McCORMICK. What, then, would constitute the limitations to be fixed by statute, as proposed by the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; or suppose he should send the deputy President, Col. House? [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Do not forget what the orders of the Senate are. The notice is for all time, not for one day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the situation suggested by the Senator from Illinois would be no different. Congress has heretofore defined the powers of the President of the United States; and Congress could in this case, and undoubtedly would, when it defined the powers of the member of the council, limit the powers of any man that sat upon the council, whether he was the President of the United States or a man appointed by the President.

Mr. McCORMICK. May I rejoin to that that there is a statute prohibiting the President of the United States from leaving this country to take part in a conference?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I agree with both Senators. They both arrive at the same destination. The Senator from Nebraska, however, prefers to accomplish it by a statute rather than by reservations.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. If the Senator from Nebraska is correct in the assumption that the limitation of the authority of our representative in the council is a domestic question, then what? Does that imply that the Congress has original and exclusive jurisdiction over the question, assuming that it is a domestic question?

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator addressing that question to the Senator from Idaho or to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GORE. To the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I would prefer that the Senator should address it to the Senator from Nebraska, because I can not answer it.

Mr. GORE. The altercation seemed to turn on this point. The Senator from Nebraska was insisting that the limitation of the power of our delegate or representative would be a domestic question, and therefore would be within the province of the Congress to regulate.

As I recall, if one nation claims that a given question is a domestic question, that question itself must be remitted to the league for decision.

Mr. BORAH. And the council decides whether or not it is a domestic question.

Mr. GORE. Yes; the council decides whether or not it is a domestic question; and if this question can be referred to the council, and the council should decide that the limitation of his authority was not a domestic question, then it could not be reached by a legislative enactment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want the Senator from Idaho to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question, because if what seems to be implied in the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska is well founded, I would no more vote for this league of nations under any circumstances than I would vote for the annihilation of the American Government; and therefore I want a little light on that subject.

Mr. BORAH. So do I.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not agreed with the Senator from Idaho with regard to his interpretation of certain parts of this covenant; but the Senator from Idaho has said that under article 4, under the clause which permits the council to deal with any matter affecting the peace of the world, it could direct that the United States shall send a military force into any part of the world for the purpose of maintaining peace.

Does the Senator from Nebraska agree to that interpretation of the article?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I do not at all. I had not interrupted the Senator from Idaho on that question. At the time he was discussing it it seemed to me to be entirely beyond the text of the league of nations. I would like to have the Senator state a case in which that could be done.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa states the case a little differently from what I stated it. What I said was this: Suppose the council, sitting in judgment upon a situation in Europe——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator specify a little what it is he means by "a situation" and "sitting in judgment"?

Mr. BORAH. A situation, for instance, which is supposed to imperil the peace of the world. We will assume that the situation in the Balkans has not yet been settled, conditions there have not been adjusted, and the council comes to the conclusion that there is a condition of affairs there which threatens the peace of the world, and therefore agrees upon a program. I do not say that the council of itself has authority to order these troops. I have not taken that position. What I do say is that if the council agrees upon a program, and submits that program to the world as a program which will preserve peace, and the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, in the discharge of his duties as Commander in Chief, sees fit to send 100,000 men to a particular portion of the Far East for the purpose of policing the situation, under this league of nations he has a perfect right to do so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not concede it at all. I think neither the council nor the President has that power.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Iowa is through, I will yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply want that point to be made just as clear as it can be made. I see no difference between the way in which the Senator from Idaho stated it and the way I stated it. What I would like to know is whether there is any reason to believe that this covenant can be construed, in the absence of article 10, to authorize the President of the United States to send an army, under any suggestion or direction of the council, to any part of the world, for the purpose of maintaining peace?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the question I was going to ask the Senator, whether he gave it that construction. I claim that it is not subject to that construction.

Mr. BORAH. There is a peculiarity about the constructions which the advocates of the league put upon this covenant. One day they construe it to have the power to preserve the peace of the world, that on the council are nine men with sufficient authority and sufficient power, surveying the situation and seeing somewhere on the horizon a cloud of disturbance, to bring into operation such forces as will preserve the peace of the world. They say to those who want peace, "We have built a world machine of sufficient force and power to bring a warring world to peace." But the very moment you get down to the concrete proposition of how they are going to do it, to wit, with an army or a navy, they immediately tell you that they have no such power; they immediately say that there is no such authority. Now, what is the logic of the position taken by the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from North Dakota? It is that this league can do nothing until the Congress of the United States acts. Then, why not leave the Congress of the United States to act without any combination or contract with foreign powers? If the council has no authority, no power, no reserve force until it consults the Congress, what reason have we to believe that its authority will preserve peace any more than the action of Congress itself, without any contract binding us?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think it is only fair to state to the Senator from Idaho what I have supposed the article to which he refers means. If I am wrong I want to be put right very soon, because it touches the very heart of the whole covenant.

Mr. BORAH. One of the hearts.

Mr. CUMMINS. It may be that it has more than one. I hope we will be able to correct everything else I have heard suggested as wrong with the league of nations through proper reservations and proper amendments, because I have voted and intend to vote for amendments. I have supposed that the article to which the Senator refers, in declaring that the council might take account of anything that affects the peace of the world, means that it can only deal with those matters which may affect the peace of the world under the express powers that are otherwise conferred upon the council in the covenant. If that article means that without restriction and limitation the council can deal with such things in any way it pleases, it is intolerable.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly it is.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that when there was given out to the American public, through the White House, a telegram from the President that he had agreed to form a defensive alliance with France, that telegram contained the statement that it only bound us to do immediately what we would otherwise be bound to do under article 10.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; and in addition to that, Mr. President, the Senator's suggestion recalls the fact that within the last 10 days there was printed in the New York Sun a long line of extracts from the leading papers of France, in which they denounced the reservation to article 10 because, they said, it would leave it to the power of Congress to say whether article 10 should be carried out or not, and take it away from the council.

In addition to that, the President said, in his Salt Lake speech, that if this reservation had the effect of confining it to Congress, it took the heart out of the league.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think the President said "if." I think he said the reservation did take the heart out of the league.

Mr. BORAH. I do not see any difference between the two propositions.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think he admitted that there was any question about the construction of the reservation.

Mr. BORAH. Very well; it must be, then, that the President understands that under article 10 the council has the power to do what the Senator from Iowa said would be intolerable, to wit, order the troops abroad.

Mr. LENROOT. No; it is the independent several obligations under article 10, irrespective of the league or council, to preserve the territorial integrity of the members of the league, of which we are relieving ourselves under the reservation.

Mr. BORAH. Then the supposition is we are relieving ourselves of it. That is what we are debating now, whether we are or not.

Mr. LENROOT. The point is that the President evidently gave it the construction that under this language we did relieve ourselves of that obligation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let us read article 4, the paragraph which I have read in connection with article 16, and I want to call the particular attention of the Senator from Iowa to this:

> The council may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

There is no limitation upon that, and there is no appeal from it to any other tribunal which can question their authority. There is no tribunal to which any dissatisfied person or nation may appeal. They have the last say, and they have the authority to deal with anything and everything.

Now turn to article 16, because the covenant must be construed as a whole. That article provides:

> It shall be the duty of the council in such case—

That is, in case any one of the nations disregards the covenants under articles 12, 13, and 15——

Mr. McCUMBER. Read a little more. "Resort to war." That the Senator has left out.

Mr. BORAH. I am glad to have the Senator from North Dakota make the correction.

Mr. McCUMBER. I stated that the Senator left those words out, which give the real meaning to that clause.

Mr. BORAH. Article 16 provides:

> Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, and 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league.

Then it says:

> It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military, naval, or air force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

We must admit that after the violation of covenants in articles 12, 13, and 15, then the council has authority to advise us what military authority we shall invoke or use, and certainly under that advice the President could send his troops to any part of the world that the council would advise.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that point is not clear to me, and I am very glad the discussion has arisen, because it ought to be made as plain as it is possible to make it. The Senator from Idaho begins his discussion, if he will permit me, with the statement that the President of the United States would, under the suggestion or direction of the council, have the same right to maintain the peace in Europe, Asia, or Africa that he has to maintain it in the United States. That prompts me to ask the Senator from Idaho what authority the President has to use the Army to maintain peace in the United States? I know it is generally assumed that the power is unlimited. I am not of that opinion. I do not know of any constitutional or statutory authority that warrants the President in using the Army of the United States merely to maintain peace or preserve order. There must be some national law or some national function or some national property involved before the President can use the armed forces of the United States for the purpose of maintaining order. I am now speaking of normal times, of course. It would be necessary to show that there was the same compulsion upon him to use the Army in a foreign country to maintain peace that we must find for his authority within our own borders.

What the Senator from Idaho has said has impressed me very deeply and really has challenged my former conviction more than it has hitherto been challenged. He is of the opinion that under the general clauses of the covenant the council may deal with any matter which affects the peace of the world in any way which they may think necessary in order to accomplish the purpose. I have not so construed that article. I have taken it for granted that the article which we have mentioned bears the same relation to the powers of the council as the preamble to the Constitution bears to the powers granted in it to Congress. We can not, simply because it is for the general welfare, do anything in Congress that we may desire to do and that we believe to be for the general welfare. We must find in the Constitution some express or incidental power at least to enact the legislation which we may believe ought to be enacted.

I am very glad that the Senator from Idaho has raised the point, and I think it well deserves a reply from those who are more favorable to this instrument than I am, although I have expected to vote for the ratification of the treaty if we are able to lift ourselves out of the awful tangle into which we are being led.

This leads me to say, with regard to the amendment now pending, that I would not be able to vote for it, although I am illy satisfied with the reservation which has been presented by the committee. I do not want to prevent the other nations of the world from agreeing with each other to protect their borders if they so desire, but I do not want the United States to assume any obligation whatever under article 10. It seems to me it ought not to be stricken out, but it either ought to be amended or there ought to be a reservation that would say simply that the United States assumes absolutely no obligations under article 10.

Mr. BORAH. I have offered a reservation which stops with the word "purpose" in the present reservation, but I felt, as a matter of good faith with my colleagues, particularly those upon the Committee on Foreign Relations, that I ought to raise the question by a motion to strike out, although my colleagues understood fully that none of these amendments were at all satisfactory to me, save the first one, as a member of that committee. In other words, they do not reach the destination toward which I am slowly and inadequately traveling. I voted for them, but all understood that I regarded them as inadequate. I felt, therefore, that I should raise it, and I have offered a reservation that stops with the word "purpose," that we shall not assume any obligations to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of any nation under article 10, or use our Army and Navy under that article for any purpose.

I think there is a great deal in what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] suggests as to the real authority of the President in using the Army for the purpose of preserving peace, but I am discussing this proposition in the light of what has been done for the last 25 or 30 years with the Army and what is being done to-day with the Army. Whatever may be the power of the President, technically speaking, with reference to the use of the Army, it has become an instrument for the execution of the laws, as it were, and for the preservation of peace in the country, and we may assume that we will not recede upon that proposition, especially under the league of nations.

The council is a political body; it is not a judicial body, although it assumes to exercise sometimes quasi judicial powers; it is not a tribunal for arbitration; it is not a legislative tribunal, although it assumes to exercise legislative powers or quasi legislative powers. In its last analysis it is merely a conclave of ambassadors, or a political gathering, accredited to that particular place by the respective Governments.

It is not a question, my friends, as to what they will have the technical right to do. It is a question of what they will be able to do under this latitudinous power which has been granted to them when there is no tribunal to which an appeal could be had and when there is no way to reject the proposal except to tear out and destroy the league.

Let us take an illustration from recent history. On the 3d day of August, 1914, Sir Edward Grey appeared before the House of Commons to advise the House of Commons of the facts concerning the impending war struggle and to take from the House of Commons its advice as to whether or not Great Britain should enter the war. Sir Edward Grey was at pains to explain to the House of Commons that Great Britain was under no legal obligation and under no binding agreement to go to the aid of France. He stated to the House that they were perfectly free to decide whether or not they would go into the war.

Technically speaking, that was true. There was no agreement in express terms that Great Britain should go to the aid of France in case she were attacked, but from the Morocco affair in 1906 down until the 2d day of August, 1914, such relationship had grown up and such conversations had been had between the representatives of Great Britain and France that the world now knows that Great Britain was under the highest moral obligation, the obligation of honor, to go to the aid of France. For instance, after the Morocco affair the French ambassador had asked Great Britain for an express agreement to the effect that in case France were attacked Great Britain would come to her aid. The representative of Great Britain, at that time I think Sir Edward Grey, said they would not enter into an express agreement, but that their naval and army experts should interchange views and conversations with reference to preparation and with reference to distribution of their armed forces.

So the representatives of these two great nations, their naval and army experts, became possessed of each other's secrets, and became possessed of each other's power with reference to any great struggle which might arise, and that relationship grew stronger, not with any express agreement, but by reason of the association which sprang up between them and the interchange of confidences.

Finally, on the 22d of November, I think it was, 1912, Sir Edward Grey wrote a letter to the French ambassador and stated to him, referring to this interchange of views between their naval and army experts, that it must be understood that that did not amount to an express agreement, but he closed his letter with the statement—and, of course, I do not undertake to quote it in exact words—that "when an emergency shall arise we engage to enter into conversations or interchange of views as to how these nations shall protect themselves." Then, on the 2d day of August, the day before he spoke in the House of Commons, he had given France the assurance that in case the German Navy were used in a certain way the English Navy would come to her rescue.

Technically there was no express agreement, but under every obligation of honor, under the highest moral obligation, England was bound to come to the aid of France. The remaining portion of Sir Edward's speech was, whether consciously or unconsciously, a powerful argument, based upon the obligation of honor, that England should go to the aid of France.

Transfer the scene to the situation which may arise when the league of nations is sitting at Geneva. Let us assume that all these technical obligations and pending agreements are put aside. Let us even assume, sir, that the Constitution of the United States would forbid us to send a man to Geneva with the power to bind 110,000,000 people without the authority of Congress in each particular instance. Let us assume the situation to be as the technical defenders of the league claim it to be. Nevertheless we sit there in council with nine men, and a question involving the peace of the world arises. The nine men decide upon a policy and a program by which our duly accredited representative, with others, determines that a certain action is necessary in order to preserve the peace of the world. Will any man rise in his place in the Congress of the United States and say to the civilized world that our representative is to be repudiated and the Congress reserve the unreserved right to decide otherwise? Suppose we have the power, and that under the Constitution it could not be delegated. We have entered into a compact which binds us in conscience and in morals and in honor to go to the program which has been decided upon.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Then watch the papers and the powers which control international affairs begin to lash the Congress of the United States to preserve the peace of the world by complying with the decision at Geneva. What will Congress do? Technical right or no right, it will do as it is doing now.

I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to get the Senator's position. Assuming that the treaty is ratified with the league of nations in it, and under article 10 the council recommends that an armed force of men be raised and sent to China, as I think the Senator stated, and recommends that the United States contribute 100,000 men of that force, do I understand it to be the Senator's position that he, as a Senator of the United States, would feel obligated to enact legislation sending those 100,000 men there because the council so advised?

Mr. BORAH. I am just one of that kind of men.

Mr. LENROOT. I am not.

Mr. BORAH. No. If the Senator would be as careful, however, as is the Senator from Idaho with reference to the kind of compact he enters into before he assumes the obligation, he might well criticize the Senator from Idaho for carrying it out after he assumes it.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish the Senator would follow the case I made. It was not an obligation, but a recommendation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is an obligation. It may not be legal. It may not be constitutional. It is an obligation, nevertheless, because we have by this covenant sent our representative there, and he, with the other nine men, has agreed upon it. The President has defined it as a moral obligation, "superior to and more effective," says the President, "than a legal obligation."

I want to say that the Senator would be for it, and seven out of ten men in the Congress of the United States would vote for it, and for the same reason that they are voting for the covenant of the league of nations, to wit, that we have been told that the seven wise men of the earth sat at Versailles and that it is a matter of extreme impudence and intolerable intolerance to differ with that which they thought was for the peace and welfare of the world; and the reason why they refuse to send this treaty back for amendment is the same reason that the Senator from Wisconsin would vote for it after it is sent there.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. I wish to recall to the Senator what doubtless he has already noticed, that public men in France are discussing the military convention between France and the United States, which is to make possible the expeditious carrying out of the terms of the treaty pending before the Senate for military action.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; they are deciding upon our program. There is no doubt about that, and they know enough about it to know that they can decide it, and that what they decide upon we will ultimately do. Have we disappointed them at any time within the last year?

We went to Paris pledged to a renunciation of the dominancy of the sea and to a declaration in favor of the freedom of the sea. England decided before we got there that we must abandon our position, and we accommodated her. We could not help it. Having sat down at their table in their own house, and in their game, being practically their guest, we could not help accommodating them in such matters.

The next thing they decided was that all the secret treaties, however unconscionable and vicious they were, should be written into this treaty. I have no doubt at all that the representatives of the United States who sat in that conference felt just as bitter and just as thoroughly humiliated over that situation as any of the rest of us. Does anybody doubt that the representative of the United States would have rejected the Shantung infamy if he had felt he could do so? But we were there, intermingling in their affairs, subject to their intrigue and their manipulation, and, under the threat of another World War and eternal chaos, we yielded to their suggestion. When we sit in the council at Geneva, with their power to manipulate and to control, with the things near at hand which they better understand than do we, the mere question of sending 100,000 men for the purpose of preserving peace will be but a bagatelle, indeed, compared with the sacrifice which we have already made.

Mr. President, I do not criticize the President of the United States for not withholding the rapacious power of the imperial system of Europe, for it was an impossible task; but we are entering into a conclave of nations where our representatives will do that every time that a European situation arises. The reason, sir, why I am against this league and against all leagues and combinations and conclaves is because I know that instead of Americanizing Europe, Europe will Europeanize America. That is what is being done now, and that is what will continue to happen.

You may appeal to your Constitution; you may say that technically we have not the power to take the action proposed, but if you do that and any European representative insists that we act, as a matter of moral obligation we will do so, or else tear down and destroy the league at once.

Mr. President, it has been asked here how could the President send troops? I ask again, as I asked a moment ago, why are our troops being kept in Russia? Under what authority are they there, and what Member of Congress is proposing to challenge that authority in any legal way? I have on my desk a news item of yesterday afternoon to the effect that 60,000 rifles have been sent from America to Kolchak. Who is Kolchak? What are our relations with him? Under what authority do we send him 60,000 rifles? Well, I will tell you by what authority, Mr. President.

As a matter of fact, a league of nations was formed in Versailles while the peace conference was sitting there; and this covenant is like an election in Mississippi; it is simply a ratification of the primary proceedings. Troops and rifles were sent to Russia because the five men sitting at Versailles decided to send them. They are being sent there from day to day, and munitions are sent there from day to day, not by any action of Congress, not by any authority of ours, not by constitutional authority, but because those with whom we are associated thought that a wise thing to do. So, Mr. President, it is not the technical power with which I am concerned. If we had some supreme court like that of the United States or some other supreme judicial tribunal by which we could call every act into question, by which we could ask the cancellation of orders, or by which we could test delegated authority, the men who talk of technicalities would have their day of hearing. We have, however, no such tribunal. These men are their own umpires; there is no appeal from them. The jurisdiction given them is of the world, their authority the peace of the world; and whether it is technically authorized or not we are granting it to them. What right have we to say that they shall not exercise it?

Mr. President, I do not think I shall ask for a vote upon this amendment this afternoon. If a vote be insisted upon, I shall withdraw the amendment, for the reason that I should like the amendment to be voted upon at a time when we know what the reservation is ultimately to be. If there is going to be any change in the reservation, I should like an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, has the Senator from Idaho read the series of articles by Ludendorff, not yet finished, in one of which he made the statement that the sending of troops into Siberia and the taking possession of the great highway of travel across Siberia had deprived Germany of the opportunity of bringing into the conflict possibly 100,000 German prisoners who were in Siberia and whom Germany expected to use? Does not the Senator know that those troops were sent into Siberia as a war measure during the midst of the war with Germany?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, Mr. President, I know that, although I have not read Ludendorff's articles, and I do not propose to spend any time reading them. But, Mr. President, what has the flood to do with the present wet weather? I am speaking about rifles which have been shipped to Kolchak within the last three weeks. Who decided upon that? I am speaking about our boys who have been suffering and fighting and dying in Russia since the war closed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho speaks as if we had a great army in Russia.

Mr. BORAH. I do not care, Mr. President, whether it is an army of 100,000 or whether it is one single simple boy from an American farm, it is an infamous outrage that he should be compelled to die in a cause in which we are not concerned. I protest in the name of a single American citizen. I protest against the usurpation of power which sends him there. I protest against the violation of the guaranties which forbid his being sent. The fact that it is ten thousand or a hundred thousand is wholly irrelevant. If you can send ten thousand you can send a hundred thousand.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think it an infamous outrage that the United States, fighting Germany, should have sent its soldiers into Siberia in sufficient force to take possession of the Siberian Railroad and prevent a hundred thousand German prisoners of war from reentering the conflict in which we were engaged?

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President, so long as the war was on, so long as we were at war with Germany or her allies, or any part of them, I had no criticism to pass upon anything that might be done; I have not the ability, of course, to criticize military experts and I have never assumed to do so; but that is all a thing of the past.

Why, Mr. President, since the action of which the able Senator from Nebraska speaks, Lloyd-George sent his special representative to Lenin and Trotski for the purpose of making peace with them, and the representative reported back.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that at the main door of the old Ford Theater, on Tenth Street, in this city, a sign is hung out bearing the words "Enlist here." On one side of it is the inscription "Siberia: Fifteen telegraph operators, 44 bandsmen wanted," and on the other side, "One and three year enlistments now open for Europe." I ask the Senator by whose authority those enlistments are being made for that purpose?

Mr. BORAH. I know of no one who is interested in having our Army in Russia other than the international bankers, who hold millions of Russian securities and who are also urging this league that American boys may be sent to restore order where other securities are in peril. What influence they exert on this Russian situation it would be difficult to say. I have no doubt it is very great.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho a little while ago made a statement which I think was made in the zeal of argument and to which, upon reflection, I think he will not adhere, when he said, in response to a question from me, that conceding the powers of the council under articles 4 and 11 were advisory only and could be exercised only by way of recommendation, yet he, as a Senator of the United States, would feel obligated to vote to carry their recommendations into effect. I think I state his answer fairly.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator has stated it fairly well; and while the Senator may be shocked at my reply, I desire to repeat what I said. If I send my agent out to accomplish a certain purpose or give him unlimited authority to advise as to a program and to advise me, I have not in any way, in my judgment, been guilty of a breach of honor if I stand by my agent. Indeed, I think in this particular kind of an agency we would be in honor bound to stand by his recommendations.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. BORAH. We are sending a gentleman to Geneva as our representative. What I say is that if I were to enter into this contract—and, of course, I am safe because I never intend to enter into it; I never intend to give allegiance to it in any shape or form, I do not care how it is written; I never intend to do aught but oppose it—but if I entered into it I should feel under obligation to the other nations in honor to respect the program which my agent agreed upon with them.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, it certainly is a most novel proposition that if a principal sends an agent, and the agent is given authority only to make recommendations back to the principal as to a given course to be pursued, the principal feels himself obligated to carry out the recommendations of the agent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if no one were involved except the agent and the principal that would be a very clear proposition; but when I send my agent to deal in honor with eight other men and they deal with him as my agent and agree upon a program, he being my agent, I owe something to those other eight men.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. Then I will state the proposition under that situation: A principal sends an agent to meet with a dozen other agents representing a dozen other principals, the agents only having the power to make recommendations, and, acting jointly, they make recommendations, and the principal feels obligated to be bound to carry out the recommendations they make, which is quite as novel as the other proposition to which I referred. I am sure the Senator upon reflection would not adhere to that.

But, Mr. President, with reference to the construction of this reservation which the Senator has criticized, I wish to call attention to the language of the reservation, because to my mind it is not possibly susceptible to the construction which he has given it:

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress—

"The Congress"—what? The Senator would read it "the Congress which"; but the Congress what?

The Congress shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

Could the English language be simpler or clearer?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what is the object of having in there the words "which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States"?

Mr. LENROOT. That is purely and solely parenthetical. It is a recital only. I have no objection to giving my understanding why those words were put in. They were put in upon the insistence of some Senators who believed that that recital would meet with more favor from our associates than if the recital were omitted. I frankly concede that it has nothing to do with the substantial part of the reservation. It does not affect it in the slightest degree; and if I had my way about it, if I could write this reservation as I should like to see it written, the recital would be stricken out entirely.

Now, Mr. President, with reference to the argument of the Senator from Idaho that we enter into obligations under article 4 and article 11 of this treaty, he has made a very able argument; but the Senator can not read anywhere into either article 4 or article 11 any jurisdiction in this council to make a decision that will be binding upon anybody. I have insisted from the beginning, and I am as well satisfied now as when the consideration of this matter began, that the proper construction of these articles is that the members agree to meet and consider and discuss matters affecting the peace of the world, but without any power to enforce or obligate anyone else to enforce any reports that may be made out of such meetings.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, assuming that the Senator is correct as to the legal obligation, does the Senator now state that it is his view of the matter that neither the council nor the assembly can make any decision which has any moral obligation that we are bound to consider?

Mr. LENROOT. I do, just that.

Mr. BORAH. Then the council, as well as the assembly, is a mere debating society.

Mr. LENROOT. Under these articles, that has been my insistence from the very beginning.

Mr. BORAH. I can imagine, then, why the Senator would agree to it, because he believes that it is perfectly harmless.

Mr. LENROOT. I have stated many times, and I have no objection to stating once more, that I do believe that this debating society, as the Senator calls it, will itself be helpful in preserving the peace of the world. I believe that taking cognizance of and discussing any matter threatening the peace of the world by this council or by the assembly, without the slightest power to bind either legally or morally any of the members of the league, will itself be very beneficial.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator claim that the assembly of the league, in the exercise of the powers conferred on it in article 15, has no power to render a binding decision?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, certainly not; of course not. I am speaking now of articles 4 and 11.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he was speaking generally of the powers of the assembly under the covenant.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; I am only referring to articles 4 and 11. Under article 10 the United States and every other member is, of course, obligated absolutely to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of every other nation, and I am opposed to that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington refers to article 15. What the Senator must understand, if I read this covenant correctly, is that the council may hurdle article 15 whenever it wants to and jump clear over it, because it may transfer the matter and transfer it on until it gets into the assembly.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes, but still under article 15. That is, a dispute must exist before they can get into either the council or assembly to make a binding decision so far as going to war is concerned; and that is the extent of their power, of course, under article 15. My point now is that neither under article 4 nor under article 11 is the council given any power to bind anybody, and yet I believe the mere discussion of matters threatening the peace of the world will be a very beneficial thing in preserving the peace of the world.

Evidently the position of some Senators is that the United States, great as it is, great as its moral influence and moral power is, should not, even to the extent of debating and discussing matters affecting the peace of the world, enter into any kind of relations with anybody. I can not agree with any such theory as that. I will go as far as anybody in protecting the United States from obligations, or compelling the United States to carry out, against the will of the Congress or the people of the United States, obligations that are sought to be imposed by this treaty; but I am not afraid of debating societies, neither am I afraid of articles 12, 13, and 15, relating to arbitration and the submission of international questions to an inquiry either by the council or by the assembly; and I am willing that the United States and every other nation should be bound by unanimous decisions where made by the council, or, if taken from the council, by the unanimous vote of all of the representatives composing the council and the majority of the other members of the league.

Those, to my mind, are the beneficial parts of this league of nations, and it is well worth entering into for those things alone; and I shall be glad to vote to ratify the league of nations portion of the treaty, as well as the whole treaty, provided we can relieve the United States from obligations in other portions of it, such as are contained in article 10, that ought not to be imposed upon the United States.

In corroboration of the construction that I have given to articles 4 and 11, the Senator from Idaho read from article 16, the second paragraph, where it is provided that—

It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military, naval, or air force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

This is a case where a member of the league has gone to war in violation of its covenant, and yet in that case it is expressly provided that the council can only make a recommendation as to the use of military and naval forces by other members of the league; and if there is one place in this treaty where the council is given power to make binding obligations, it certainly would be in article 16. It is not, however. It is expressly stated there that they may make recommendations; and if they are only recommendations under article 16, how can they be any stronger under articles 4 and 11, which do not consist of violations of covenants at all, so far as making war is concerned?

But, Mr. President, I rose simply to express my opinion that the reservation which the Senator from Idaho has so criticized is complete in itself and fully protects the United States not only from the obligation to preserve the political independence and territorial integrity of any other nation, but it also relieves the United States from any obligation to use the military or naval forces under any article of the league.

The Senator from Idaho, usually so easy to follow, because he is so clear in his expression, I must confess I could not follow wherein, if I understood him correctly, he stated that if we adopted this reservation with his construction and ratified the treaty the President of the United States would be authorized to use the armed forces of the United States just exactly as he is now using them in Siberia. In other words, if I understood him correctly, if we adopt this league of nations the President will have the same authority to use the armed forces of the United States that he has to use them without any league of nations. I am willing to concede that and admit it, but with this reservation: The President has no authority from this league to use the military and naval forces of the United States for any purpose; and if he has that authority it is found not in the league but in the Constitution itself, and he has that authority, if he has it at all, irrespective of this treaty of peace.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, does the Senator concede that if it were not for the reservation of article 10 the President would have the authority to use these armed forces?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not concede that he would.

Mr. BORAH. What is the necessity of the reservation?

Mr. LENROOT. The obligation would rest upon Congress to furnish them without the reservation.

Mr. BORAH. But you say in the reservation that he shall not use the armed forces of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. The reservation does not say that. It says that the United States shall be under no obligation to do so.

Mr. BORAH. Well, of course I am taking my own construction of it. The Senator takes another construction. The Senator contends, then, that without any reservation at all the President would have no authority upon the recommendation of the council, no justification, legal or moral, in sending forces to any foreign country for the purpose of preserving peace?

Mr. LENROOT. I should say no authority gained from this league of nations. If he had any, it would be independent of it.

Mr. BORAH. The position which the Senator takes, then, is that the covenant does not give the President any authority whatever in addition to what he has now?

Mr. LENROOT. It creates obligations upon the United States, but has nothing to do with the authority that is to be exercised by the President.

Mr. BORAH. Now, assuming that the President has the authority to distribute his troops and his men as he sees fit as Commander in Chief, if we should ratify this league without any reservation at all, what objection could be made to his sending troops to a foreign country?

Mr. LENROOT. If he has the authority to do it, and we have the obligation to do it, of course there could be no objection; but that is what I am objecting to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. JONES of Washington obtained the floor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska will state the inquiry.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood that the Senator from Idaho had withdrawn his amendment for the present.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to have the amendment voted on at present, in view of the construction which has been placed upon this reservation by one of those who, I presume, helped to frame it. I should like to have an opportunity to consult about the matter and see if we can not change the language to make it speak the construction of the Senator. Therefore I desire to withdraw the amendment. At the same time I do not want to put the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] in a position where he must go ahead this evening if he does not want to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was the understanding, when the La Follette amendment was deferred until to-morrow, that the Shantung amendment and the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma should be taken up.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Oklahoma is ready, I have no objection.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is rather late, and I have not any desire to press it to-night if it is not convenient.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to address myself to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho for a few minutes, perhaps 10 minutes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is not before the Senate, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho that the amendment be temporarily withdrawn?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I understood the Chair to recognize me a moment ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Washington to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; and when he is through I want to resume the floor for just a moment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I sought a ruling on the point whether or not the amendment of the Senator from Idaho is before the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. In order to clarify the situation, I withdraw the amendment which I offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the amendment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, before the amendment is withdrawn I want to say just a word. As I understand the position of the Senator from Idaho, I think there is a great deal of force in it. It appeals to me, at any rate. It has seemed to me that in the discussion of the action by the council we have often overlooked the effect of the provision that requires unanimous consent before a decision is reached by the council. The council can make no decision on matters of importance except it agree unanimously.

The argument with reference to our position is based largely upon the proposition that the council has reached a decision. If that is the proper basis upon which to place it, then, it seems to me, after the council has made a decision, which necessarily implies that our representative has assented to that decision, there is a very binding force upon the United States to comply with that decision, whatever it may be. I propose to suggest, to meet that situation, something which will carry out the idea suggested by the Senator from Nebraska a while ago. I do not want our representative on this council to assent to any decision that involves the sending of our armed forces across the sea to any foreign country to settle any dispute there unless the Congress of the United States first gives its consent to it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, does the Senator claim that the council could come to a decision to send our Army anywhere?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no, Mr. President. I had no such idea in my mind, and if I used any language that conveyed any such impression as that I was very unfortunate in it. What I tried to point out was that when the council has reached a decision upon a situation, and has, for instance, held that 100,000 men are necessary to take care of that situation, when our representative on the council gives his consent to that, and there can not be a decision without it, then this Nation, if it can be morally bound to do anything, is morally bound to furnish its quota of troops, and if we refuse to do it the nations of the earth can point the finger of dishonor at us. I do not want our country to be placed in that position, and I do not want the matter to rest with a single individual across the sea to put this Nation of ours in that situation.

So, Mr. President, I rose simply to give notice that unless the reservation proposed by the committee is amended to meet a situation of that sort, I propose, when it comes up for consideration, to offer this as an amendment to that reservation:

> And our representative in the council shall not give his consent to any decision involving the use of the military or naval forces of the United States under any provision of this covenant until the proposal has been submitted to Congress, and it has expressly authorized him to give such consent.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the point I regard as an extremely important one. If it is not guarded under the reservation numbered 7, dealing with representatives, it ought to be provided for.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was wondering why the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] desires to have the covenant amended so that article 10 shall be eliminated; for that, I understand, is the purport of his motion. If it shall prevail, our action really amounts to this, that we propose to the other nations interested in the matter that we will ratify the treaty provided article 10 is eliminated. It will then not be effective as against any party to the treaty.

Four nations have already ratified the treaty with article 10 in. They are entirely satisfied to have the article in its entirety so far as they are concerned. I do not know why the Senator from Idaho should desire to relieve them from the burdens and obligations of article 10, such as they are, if they are quite willing to assume them. In other words, I do not see why he does not make his amendment practically to this effect, simply to add a provision to the effect that the United States shall not be bound by this article. That will accomplish everything that he desires. That is not the effect of the reservation that is proposed, but a reservation to that effect might be easily proposed—that is to say, that we would ratify, on condition, however, that the United States is not bound by the obligations of article 10.

I speak of that at this time for the purpose of showing that strangely a great many people make a marked distinction, an essential distinction, apparently recognizing a very important difference between a reservation and an amendment. I can not see why it would make any difference whether you accomplish that end through an amendment such as I suggest to the Senator from Idaho, or whether you accomplish the end by attaching a condition to your article of ratification. Perhaps there may be some difference in the minds of some, but I am not able to apprehend it.

Mr. BORAH. I will say to the Senator from Montana that I have already offered a reservation along the lines which he has suggested; but we have not reached reservations yet.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand; but I suggest to the Senator that he will accomplish exactly the same result by tendering it as an amendment to article 10, and without, so far as I see, affecting the situation at all.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator means to tender it as a reservation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; tender it as an amendment to article 10. Why not? What is the difference? Why does not the Senator present his amendment right now and discuss the whole thing? What is the difference whether you put it in in the body of the instrument or attach it as a condition to your signature? Suppose this were a matter of private negotiation between the Senator and myself, and he drafted a contract and sent it to me with a certain article in it. I strike out the article and send it back in that way or I leave the article in, and I sign the instrument, saying, "I am not obligated, however, by article 2 or article 3, or article 4."

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator that it would accomplish the same object; but in view of the fact that these other nations have already ratified the treaty the striking of it out at this time would have the same effect, in my judgment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. You do not strike it out. Leave it in.

Mr. BORAH. I mean if I struck it out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly; that is what I suggested to the Senator, that it would seem that he did not desire to strike the article out; but I inquired of him why he should frame his amendment in that way.

I desire to say, Mr. President, that I quite agree with the Senator from Idaho that the reservation to which we have listened does not change the situation in the slightest degree. I have not any doubt in the world, and I have never heard any argument to the contrary that seemed to me based upon reason at all, if any has been indulged in of any kind, to the effect that we would get into a state of war without a declaration of war by the Congress of the United States and in accordance with the Constitution. Indeed, Mr. President, that is the only ground upon which this covenant can be justified constitutionally at all. There is not any question about that.

But, Mr. President, I want to speak for a moment about the suggestion made by the Senator from Idaho that the President of the United States, if we ratify this covenant, would be authorized to send an army anywhere over the world without any precedent action by Congress in declaring war. I apprehend that if the President of the United States issued an order to any of the officers of the Army to go anywhere, those officers would go there. They would either go, or they would resign their offices, and others would be appointed who would go.

In other words, Mr. President, it seems almost a physical impossibility, under our system, to prevent the President of the United States from sending an army anywhere he sees fit to send it, as suggested by the Senator from Idaho. The only remedy that I know of that we have in such a case as that is to impeach the President of the United States, and of course if he sent an army, for the purpose of making war, into a country with which we are at peace, he would be subject to impeachment.

Mr. President, it is said that he is sending troops to Russia at this time, or has been sending them. But, as suggested by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], he is not doing so by virtue of any power that comes to him under the league of nations, because, so far as we are concerned, at least, the league of nations does not exist. If he has no legal power or authority under the Constitution to send troops into Russia, what is the remedy? Impeach the President of the United States. That is all you can do about it. Put some one in the Presidency who will call the troops home from Russia. But has any suggestion been made from any source whatever, in either House of Congress, that the President of the United States ought to be impeached by reason of the fact that he has sent troops to Russia? If so, I have not heard it.

Mr. President, the President will be in exactly the same situation when the league of nations is established, and we become a party to it, that he is in now. If he shall undertake to send troops into a foreign country, there to make war, without a previous declaration by Congress, he will be subject to impeachment, just exactly as he is now. Certainly the President of the United States gets no authority by this article. The obligation rests upon the Government of the United States. It acts through Congress in declaring war. I have not heard from any source any argument to the effect that under this the President would be invested with any authority whatever.

The Senator assumes, and that seems to be the burden of his argument, as it seems to me, not that the league of nations, and particularly the council of the league of nations, is actually clothed with these vast powers with which he assumes they may be clothed, but that they will usurp these powers.

We can not, as a matter of course, protect ourselves in advance against any usurpation of power by the council or by any other body. We never refuse to give officers power or authority on the ground that they would usurp other powers which have not been confided to them. We simply refuse, as a matter of course, to recognize any authority in the league of nations or in the council of the league of nations beyond the powers that are granted to them thereby. I fully agree with the Senator from Wisconsin when he says that wherever the league or the council or the assembly is given power only to advise, to recommend, there can not possibly be any moral obligation upon the part of the United States to follow the recommendation. Otherwise you might just as well use another word. Take article 16, for instance, where the council is called upon to recommend the forces that shall be used for any particular purpose. If the recommendation is not satisfactory to us, upon what theory can it be urged that we are bound to follow the recommendation? I can not believe that anyone will conceive that when the council is authorized only to advise or to propose, anybody is under any obligation to follow the suggestion made. For instance, take the provision of the covenant which authorizes the council to propose a plan of disarmament. If the United States is not satisfied with the plan that is proposed, can it be urged that the United States is under any moral obligation to legislate in conformity with the recommendation that has been made or the proposal that is offered for its consideration? I can not think that anybody will be deterred from giving his approval to the covenant upon any suggestion of that character, at least.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma is anxious to take up his amendment in the morning. He thinks there will be but very brief debate and that it can be quickly disposed of, and that will allow ample time for the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to make his speech before 3 o'clock, at which time the vote is to be taken upon the La Follette amendment. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess——

Mr. KING. Will the Senator withhold his motion for a moment? I understood that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] or the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] would desire to call up a measure which has passed the House and which will only take a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that the Senator from Washington is out of the Chamber, and I have been unable to locate the bill that was to be laid before the Senate. I do not think there will be any objection to the consideration of it to-morrow morning, provided——

Mr. LODGE. Yes; there will be objection to its consideration to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMOOT. Provided it does not lead to any debate?

Mr. LODGE. There will be objection. To-morrow morning is to be devoted to the treaty. I do not want to mislead anyone. I think we will have to put it off until we have a morning hour if it is not ready now. I will gladly yield now. I do not want to make any promises of that kind for to-morrow morning.

Mr. KING. In view of that fact, I shall not ask the Senator to withhold his motion.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, November 5, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, November 5, 1919.

(Legislative day of Monday, November 3, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harrison	McKellar	Ransdell
Brandegee	Henderson	McLean	Reed
Capper	Hitchcock	McNary	Robinson
Colt	Johnson, Calif.	Moses	Sheppard
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Dial	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Smith, S. C.
Edge	Kellogg	Norris	Smoot
Elkins	Kendrick	Nugent	Spencer
Gay	Kenyon	Overman	Thomas
Gerry	Keyes	Owen	Trammell
Gore	King	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Gronna	Kirby	Phelan	Walsh, Mont.
Hale	La Follette	Phipps	Watson
Harding	Lodge	Poindexter	Williams

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the absence, on official business, of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the absence of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who is attending a hearing before the Committee on Military Affairs, the absence of the other Members of which has been already announced.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], and the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] are absent on account of illness.

The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are detained on public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PROMOTION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As in legislative session, the Chair lays before the Senate a response of the United States Shipping Board to Senate resolution 203, which will be printed in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, October 30, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE A. SANDERSON,
Secretary United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Complying with provisions of Senate resolution No. 203, dated October 3, dealing with foreign commerce of the United States, I am pleased to advise:

1. The interest of the Shipping Board in foreign commerce is a primary one to the extent that at present more than 85 per cent of its fleet of over 7,000,000 dead-weight tonnage is engaged in foreign trade. However, in the operation of the Shipping Board fleet, the Division of Operations acts only as the transportation agency for American importers and exporters.

2. The personnel of the Division of Operations (headquarters and field), whose primary function is ship operation, with development of foreign commerce as incident thereto, is necessary to supervise operations of the board's fleet, and said personnel is not greater by reason of its indirect interest in foreign commerce. The total personnel of the Division of Operations as of September 30, 1919, was 1,752, at an annual expenditure for salaries of $3,540,032.

3. Except for the Panama Railroad & Steamship Co., the Division of Operations is the only governmental agency engaged in the commercial operation of ships.

4. The Division of Operations of the Shipping Board maintains a department, known as the governmental and foreign relations department, which has a personnel numbering seven, at an annual expenditure of approximately $15,000.

5. The duties of the governmental and foreign relations department, in addition to acting as liaison with Government departments and representatives of foreign countries, on current business, comprise transactions with the War Department for the return of Shipping Board vessels and the redelivery of foreign vessels to owners.

6. The work of the governmental and foreign relations department is not a duplication of the work of any other Government department, as its personnel fully appreciates and realizes that various departments of our Government and foreign Governments represented in Washington have information available which is of vast value in the consideration of our problems, and which said department readily takes advantage of and secures when it is necessary to answer certain requests, thereby avoiding and eliminating the possibility of a duplication of the activities of other Government departments.

Very respectfully,

JOHN J. FLAHERTY, Secretary.

STRIKE OF COAL MINERS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have received a copy of resolutions from the Edwin V. Evans Post of the American Legion, located at the University of Colorado, referring to the present coal strike, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EDWIN V. EVANS POST OF AMERICAN LEGION,
University of Colorado, October 31, 1919.

Whereas the leaders of the coal miners' unions have announced their intention of declaring a nation-wide strike in the coal fields; and

Whereas the President of the United States, the Attorney General of the United States, and the governor of Colorado have declared this action unlawful and a menace to the welfare of the country; and

Whereas the leaders of the coal miners' unions have declared their intention to persist in calling this strike, despite the appeal and declaration of the Federal and State authorities; and

Whereas such action will be in open defiance of governmental authority, of overwhelming public opinion, and of the Nation's welfare: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Edwin V. Evans Post of the American Legion:

First. That its members pledge themselves, by any means in their power, to aid the Federal, State, and county authorities in any emergency which may arise to suppress violence, to maintain law and order, to protect property and life, and to alleviate suffering and hardship which will result from this unwarranted closing of the mines of the country.

Second. That a copy of this resolution be given to the press, to the Senators and Congressmen from Colorado, to the governor of the State, and to the sheriff of the county.

GERRY CHAPMAN, Commander.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing that a committee of six Members of the House of Representatives, to be selected by the Speaker, and six Members of the Senate, to be selected by the President of the Senate, be appointed to represent the Congress at such appropriate ceremonies at the port of New York when the steamship Lake Daraga is expected to arrive in New York, on or about November 9, bearing the first bodies of American soldiers from the fields of the World War, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 641. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918;

S. 2883. An act authorizing the Meridian Highway Bridge Co., a corporation, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges and approaches thereto across the Missouri River between Yankton County, S. Dak., and Cedar County, Nebr.; and

H. R. 7751. An act authorizing the sale of inherited and unpartitioned allotments for town-site purposes in the Quapaw Agency, Okla.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of sundry students of the Leland Powers School, of Boston, Mass., praying for the ratification of the league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COLT presented a memorial of Local Lodge No. 119, Militant and Progressive International Association of Machinists, of Newport, R. I., remonstrating against the deportation of certain Hindus, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. From the Committee on Mines and Mining, I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 241) to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the year 1919, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provision of section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which requires on each mining claim located and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor to be performed, or improvements aggregating such amount to be made each year, be, and the same is hereby, suspended as to all mining claims in the United States, including Alaska, during the calendar year 1919: Provided, That every claimant of any such mining claim in order to obtain the benefits of this resolution shall file or cause to be filed in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded on or before December 31, 1919, a notice of his desire to hold said mining claim under this resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred, as follows:

By Mr. THOMAS:

A bill (S. 3374) granting an increase of pension to Corydon W. Sanborn; and

A bill (S. 3375) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Leher; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 3376) granting an increase of pension to Edward Smith; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 3377) for the relief of Lieut. Col. John R. White; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. EDGE:

A bill (S. 3378) to provide for the enforcement of the anti-trust laws; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RETURN OF MORTAL REMAINS OF AMERICAN SOLDIERS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the concurrent resolution just received from the House of Representatives be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the steamship Lake Daraga is expected to arrive in New York on or about November 9, bearing the first bodies of American soldiers from the fields of the World War; and

Whereas it is proper and fitting that due recognition be given to the return to our shores of the mortal remains of those men who gave their lives for the cause of freedom: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a committee of six Members of the House of Representatives, to be selected by the Speaker, and six Members of the Senate, to be selected by the President of the Senate, be appointed to represent the Congress at such appropriate ceremonies at the port of New York as may be determined upon as proper and appropriate.

That the expenses of said committee and of the ceremonies arranged by it shall be paid one-half out of the contingent fund of the House and one-half out of the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers to be signed by the chairman of the House and Senate committees, respectively.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I propose the amendment to the covenant of the league of nations of which I have heretofore given notice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma offers the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, line 5, at the end of the first paragraph of article 12 of the covenant of the league of nations, after the words "they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council," insert the following: "and not then until an advisory vote of the people shall have been taken."

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a few moments in the discussion of this amendment. So far I have refrained from taking any part in the discussion of this treaty. I have been anxious to speed the treaty to final action. I have sympathized with the prevailing sentiment throughout the country that the treaty should be ratified without needless delay.

I wish to say, however, that I do not concur with those who imagine that final action upon the treaty will bring industrial repose to a distracted Nation or to a distracted world. The existing industrial unrest is based upon deeper and wider foundations than the slender isthmus between peace de facto and peace de jure.

There are, however, many people who anticipate an immediate return of industrial peace upon the ratification of this treaty In my judgment that is a vain hope, but it will render this substantial service: It will demonstrate that the unrest arises from other causes than mere delay in connection with the pending treaty. The elimination of this erroneous cause will set our feet in the path of progress toward the discovery of the real cause of existing distress, and that, sir, is one step in the evolution of a real remedy for existing social and industrial discontent.

Mr. President, I have submitted this proposition in the form of an amendment rather than in the form of a reservation, for reasons which I shall present to the Senate. There are Senators who are unalterably opposed to the adoption of textual amendments to the treaty. They apprehend that such amendments would occasion delay. I do not believe that it would cause the delay which Senators apprehend. I have for my own part voted for a number of amendments, and I shall vote for a number of reservations.

Amendments do directly what reservations do indirectly. I have felt that I ought to vote to do directly what in my opinion ought to be done. I have felt that the Senate of the United States, which is a constitutional part of the treaty-making power, ought not to resort to indirection in the discharge of its highest constitutional function. But I appreciate the feelings and the attitude of those who are resisting amendments in the conscientious belief that their adoption would occasion protracted delay. I would have accommodated this proposition to their views and to their attitude if I had found it possible to do so, but I have not been able to work out a reservation which would accomplish the purpose which I propose by the pending amendment.

The situation in the Senate has been perfectly obvious from the beginning. On the one hand, no textual amendments to the treaty could be adopted; on the other hand, the treaty itself could not be ratified without reservations. I have supported certain amendments knowing they would be defeated. I could not consistently oppose amendments which commended themselves to my judgment and conscience when I felt in duty bound in the interest of democracy and peace to propose this amendment securing the people a right to an advisory vote. Every Senator knows that to reject all reservations is to reject the treaty itself. To advise the rejection of all reservations is to take the responsibility of advising the rejection of both the treaty and the league of nations. I have not felt willing to assume this responsibility. It is a condition that confronts us, and I endeavored long ago to prevail upon my colleagues to adopt a practical program which would neither ignore the facts nor join issue with the inevitable.

Now to my amendment. Under article 12 of the covenant the member nations obligate themselves not to resort to war for a period of three months after the award of the arbitrators or the report of the council.

This is a self-imposed limitation on the part of nations which contemplate war. The President has asserted that the chief virtue of the league of nations is the fact that it insures discussion and that it provides a cooling time for the heated passions of peoples. I offer an amendment which will invite further discussion and which will afford further opportunity for the cooling of passions. The amendment which I offer proposes that nations after the expiration of the three months shall not even then resort to war until an advisory vote of the people shall have been taken. This is a self-assumed restraint on the part of nations which contemplate a resort to war. It is not liable to the objection that a nation might be invaded or that the danger of invasion might be too imminent to admit of delay. I repeat that this amendment, taken in connection with the text of article 12, affords no foundation for that argument or that apprehension, for if the nations will respect their obligation to adjourn war for a period of three months after the award of the arbitrators or the report of the council, there is no greater reason to doubt that they will respect their further obligation; that they will respect a self-imposed obligation to adjourn the resort to war until an advisory vote of their people may be taken. This eliminates that fear and that apprehension so commonly urged against a referendum upon the issue of peace or war.

We have heard a great deal in these latter days about world democracy. We have been assured that the United States entered this mighty conflict in order to "make the world safe for democracy." The purpose, I assume, was to democratize the world. With that purpose, whether real or ideal, I sympathize; it is undoubtedly a consummation most devoutly to be desired. In harmony with that lofty spirit, I propose this amendment in order to democratize war. I propose an advisory vote of the people on the part of nations contemplating war before they take up arms and plunge their people into the whirlpool of butchery and of blood.

Mr. President, this amendment, this plan, is the only way to democratize war and, in my judgment, it is the best way to prevent and minimize war. Perhaps no one indulges the fond hope that war can be entirely eradicated among the children of men; certainly not until further evolution has been realized in the progress of human affairs; but this amendment is in harmony with our professed purpose in entering the war; this amendment is in harmony with the spirit of the times; this amendment is in harmony with the great currents of human affairs; this amendment is in harmony with the genius of our free institutions; it is in harmony with the principles of self-government; it is in harmony with the theory that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed; it is in harmony with the high resolve that this Government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth. This amendment is in harmony with the historic declaration of President Wilson made at Washington's Tomb on July 4, 1918:

> The settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, of economic arrangement, or of political relationship, must be upon the basis of free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned.

My desire is to exemplify my faith in the capacity of the people to govern themselves not alone in national concerns but in affairs that are international.

Whatever else may be said in behalf of the league of nations, it can not be said that it is entirely democratic in its organization. It lacks the two essential conditions of democracy: The representatives to the league are not chosen by a direct vote of the people, and the representatives are not directly responsible to the body of the people in the constituent nations. It lacks both essentials of democracy—direct choice and direct responsibility. One of these conditions is essential even to the semblance of democracy. Both of these conditions are essential to the substance of democracy.

There is one other feature of the league which is not entirely consonant with democratic principles or democratic institutions. In some measure, at least, legislative, executive, and judicial powers are combined and centralized in the hands of the selfsame set of men. Such a combination of powers, Mr. President, is the source and the sinews of despotism. The separation of these powers is essential to liberty and is indispensable to democracy. In dispensing with this partition of powers we now accept as an article of faith and as a rule of action a scheme—I may say an experiment—which bears the universal condemnation of all human experience.

Not only that, but as at present constituted the league will be a government of men and not a government of laws. The will of the council, the will of the assembly, so far as I can ascertain, will not be bound by the principles of international law as they have heretofore existed. There is no rule of action prescribed for the guidance of these men; there is no fixed standard to govern their deliberations or their decisions, and, in the absence of law, there can be no such thing as responsible and assured justice. But I waive these considerations.

There is, Mr. President, in the pending treaty the recognition of one democratic principle. The recognition is not theoretical or academic; it is explicit. The treaty proposes to reduce this principle to practice. It proposes to apply this democratic principle in concrete cases for the decision of important issues and determining the fate and allegiance of considerable bodies of people. I refer, Mr. President, to the plebiscite or to the referendum which is to be applied in the Saar Valley and which is also to be applied in Upper Silesia. The treaty undertakes to apply this democratic principle, perhaps, to the one set of circumstances to which it is least applicable. To allow a small body of people occupying a narrow tract of territory to determine the destiny of great States and larger peoples, I am not certain is required by the principle of the plebiscite, and I am not certain that it will contribute to international peace.

I hope that this resort to the plebiscite will be justified by events; but, however that may be, the point I now make is that the peace commission and the pending peace treaty give distinct and practical recognition to the principle of the referendum or to the principle of the plebiscite.

If the people of the Saar Valley, if the people of Silesia, are to be permitted to decide by an advisory vote under what flag they will live, is it inconsistent to permit them to pass judgment upon the vital issues of peace and war? That is the principle which I invoke.

I should explain that my amendment provides solely for an advisory vote. I do not propose to make this vote conclusive or binding. This distinction rests upon two considerations. Under our Constitution, this league could not provide for a mandatory vote upon the question of peace or war. The power to declare war is vested by our Constitution in the Congress of the United States, and not even the league of nations could divest the Congress of that constitutional power. I do believe, however, that an advisory vote touching the question of peace or war would not be incompatible either with the letter or with the spirit of our Constitution. I am certain that it would be compatible with the spirit of our institutions and with the genius of our people.

There is one other practical reason for providing for an advisory rather than for a conclusive and binding referendum. I think that an advisory vote is in the interest of peace. It is conservative in its character and tendencies. Let me illustrate what I mean.

Suppose that a nation contemplating war should take a vote upon that issue. Suppose that the war party should prevail by a majority of only 1,000 in a vast vote. If the vote were mandatory, if it were final and conclusive, the nation would thereupon find itself in a state of war. It could not retrace its steps, notwithstanding the even division of sentiment among its people. On the other hand, if the vote were advisory and only advisory, the authority charged with the power to declare war, finding sentiment so evenly divided, might still find ways and means to keep the peace, and to avert the impending calamities of war. For this reason, I submit that an advisory vote would contribute more to the maintenance of peace than would a mandatory vote upon the issue.

The object of my amendment is, I repeat, to democratize war. In view of the recognition of the plebiscite in this treaty, there can be no objection founded upon principle to the application of the principle of the plebiscite to the issues of peace and war. My purpose is to permit the people who are to bear the burdens of war to have at least an advisory vote as to the desirability of a proposed war. I wish to let the boys who are to bleed and die, I wish to let the fathers and mothers of the boys who are to bleed and die, have the privilege of at least an advisory vote as to the indispensable necessity of a proposed war.

In view of the recognition by the treaty of the principle of the plebiscite, there can be only one argument against this proposed amendment. That is the ancient, the undemocratic, the autocratic argument that the people are not qualified to pronounce judgment upon the issue of peace and war. It is the autocratic, it is the undemocratic, contention that the people do not understand the finesse of foreign diplomacy, that the people do not understand the profound principles of international jurisprudence, that the people do not understand the mysteries of higher statecraft; it is the old contention that the people do not understand their own vital interests, the contention that the people do not understand and can not preserve their own national honor; it is the old contention that the people are not capable of self-government.

Mr. President, one hundred and fifty years ago it was denied by kings and emperors and czars that the people were capable of self-government even in domestic affairs. Those in high places feared democracy. Tyrants feared that it meant the rule of the mob and the reign of the anarchist. Faith in the capacity of the people for self-government is the slow growth of uncounted centuries. It comes only with the process of the suns. At that time they challenged the capacity of the people equally with respect to national and international affairs. With opportunity and experience, the people have demonstrated their capacity for self-government in connection with local and national concerns. If they are afforded an opportunity, as they will one day take the opportunity, the people will demonstrate their capacity for government in international affairs. Thomas Jefferson rendered his country, Thomas Jefferson rendered the human race, no greater service than in the exhibition of his unfaltering faith in the capacity of the people for self-government.

Mr. President, for my own part I think that the people themselves are quite as well qualified to pronounce judgment upon the question of peace and war as are kings and emperors and kaisers and czars. I think that an advisory vote on the part of the people would be a salutary guide to the action of congresses and parliaments. The voice of the people is the nearest approach to the voice of God.

What Senator is willing to deny the capacity of the people for self-government? What Senator is willing to deny the capacity of the people to pronounce judgment upon the questions of peace and war? What Senator is willing to deny the fathers and mothers of the soldiers of this and other countries at least an advisory vote upon the tragic issue of life and death? What Senator is willing to draft free-born American citizens to die in a war which he insists they can not understand? If this be true, why not let the sages, let the savants, let the statesmen who understand these wars wage these wars which baffle the understanding and which exceed the capacity of the common man? What democratic nation will deny the capacity or the right of its people to have an advisory vote before resorting to the bloody arbitrament of the sword? If the Kingdom of Great Britain is democratic, will it deny its people this democratic right? If the Republic of France is democratic, will it deny its people this democratic right? If the Kingdom of Italy is democratic, will it deny its people this democratic right? The very word "democracy" means the rule of the people. The consent of the governed is the soul of democracy. To me it was a distinct disappointment that the covenant of the league did not embody this democratic principle, that it did not embody a provision for an advisory vote preceding an appeal to the sword. If tendered by this country I believe this principle would be accepted by every nation which professes democracy. I know it would be adopted by every nation which practices democracy. You may delay, you can not defeat, the ultimate triumph of this principle of true democracy. I propose this amendment in the interest of democracy and peace. My sole and supreme purpose in the presentation of this amendment and in my course touching the pending treaty has been to promote peace and prevent war. My devotion to peace, my abhorrence of war, is beyond challenge.

Mr. President, it would be a calamity worse than war if nothing came out of this war to prevent or to minimize war, to minimize the causes and possibilities of war, to minimize the horrors and sorrows of war. If the human race, bleeding now at every pore, should waste this opportunity to erect every possible guaranty of peace, it would, in my judgment, constitute an impeachment of twentieth-century civilization. Of course, there will be no final preventive of war until mankind comes to regard war as the worst of evils. This has never yet happened. Men have not regarded war as the worst of evils. Ofttimes they have regarded it as an inconsiderable evil, and apparently at times have looked upon war as a positive blessing in itself. Education in that direction, evolution in the direction of peace, must be our remedy, and we can not rely solely upon a mere paper contrivance. Such contrivances have often been formulated in the past. Such contrivances have often been signed by high signatory powers. Such contrivances have often bound the honor of nations in the past, yet they have proven to be ropes of sand. They have not kept the peace; they have not averted war; still that should not discourage an honest effort on our part to promote peace and to prevent war.

Mr. President, I have voted for a series of amendments to the treaty. I shall vote for a series of reservations to the treaty. These votes have only one purpose, have only one object, to minimize the causes, to minimize the dangers, to minimize the possibilities of war. I have voted, in the interest of peace, to clarify the terms of this treaty, to make the terms of the treaty certain and distinct beyond the possibility of cavil, as far as human foresight can bring that to pass.

Uncertainty is the womb of war. Its spawn is strife. As far as I can, I wish to obviate all uncertainty. When the President laid the first draft of this league before the American people it evoked a great deal of constructive criticism, and I say that constructive criticism is now and has always been the headlight of advancing civilization. To extinguish such criticism would be to petrify the human race.

When the President returned to Paris he undertook to respond in three important particulars to the criticism which the treaty had evoked. He secured a change in regard to the Monroe doctrine, in regard to domestic questions, and in regard to the right of withdrawal. The President's efforts, in the opinion of a great many patriotic people, did not quite succeed. Indeed, he has proclaimed that the treaty was not all that he wanted. Old World diplomacy hampered his efforts and limited his success.

The Senate is now engaged in an effort to complete the changes which the President attempted upon his return to Paris. The Senate is now engaged in an effort to make it certain beyond doubt that the Monroe doctrine is not abrogated, to make it certain beyond doubt that domestic questions are reserved within the jurisdiction of the United States, to make certain that the right to withdraw is so distinct that it can never be challenged, and that the United States will never be obliged to hew its way out of the league of nations with the sword.

Mr. President, I am one of those Americans who believe in America for Americans. I believe in an America of Americans, by Americans, for Americans. I am one of those who believe that we ought to declare, as our fathers declared, that these States, then colonies, are and of right ought to be free and independent States. I do not think that this declaration should be made with either a blush or an apology.

I am one of those who believe that sovereignty is to a nation what honor is to a man and what chastity is to a woman. I am one of those who believe that it is as impossible to arbitrate purely domestic questions as it would be to arbitrate the sanctity of the home. There are many Americans who would insist upon the preservation of the Monroe doctrine as they would insist upon the sacred right of self-preservation.

These sentiments, Mr. President, ought not to be the subject of criticism. They are animated by patriotism. They may be ill-advised, they may be unwise, and yet they are inspired by pure Americanism, they are animated by undoubted patriotism.

The President maintains that the language respecting domestic questions, the Monroe doctrine, and the right of withdrawal means exactly what certain Senators insist the language should mean. All agree as to what the language should mean. The only dispute is as to whether the language actually bears that meaning beyond all doubt. This ought to be the easiest imaginable difference to adjust and reconcile. When men agree as to what they wish to say, they ought to be able to agree as to how to say it. If serious men can not adjust a difference of this character, how can they hope to prevail upon jealous nations to adjust and compromise quarrels which are older than recorded history? May I not commend to all parties concerned the spirit of conciliation?

I wish to insert at this place the famous parable against persecution. It is a classic, and is supposed to run back to the ancient Jewish Talmud.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

And it came to pass after these things that Abraham sat in the door of his tent, about the going down of the sun. And behold a man bent with age coming from the way of the wilderness leaning on a staff. And Abraham arose, and met him, and said unto him, "Turn in, I pray thee, and wash thy feet, and tarry all night; and thou shalt arise early in the morning, and go on thy way." And the man said, "Nay; for I will abide under this tree." But Abraham pressed him greatly; so he turned, and they went into the tent; and Abraham baked unleavened bread, and they did eat. And when Abraham saw that the man blessed not God, he said unto him, "Wherefore dost thou not worship the most high God, creator of heaven and earth?" And the man answered and said, "I do not worship thy God, neither do I call upon his name; for I have made myself a god, which abideth always in my house, and provideth me with all things." And Abraham's zeal was kindled against the man, and he arose and fell upon him, and drove him forth with blows into the wilderness. And God called unto Abraham, saying, "Abraham, where is the stranger?" And Abraham answered and said, "Lord, he would not worship Thee, neither would he call upon Thy name; therefore have I driven him out from before my face into the wilderness." And God said, "Have I borne with him these hundred ninety and eight years, and nourished him, and clothed him, notwithstanding his rebellion against me; and couldst not thou, who art thyself a sinner, bear with him one night?"

Mr. GORE. In behalf alike of the interest, the honor, and the dignity of the United States, I voted for an amendment and I shall vote for a reservation to equalize the voting power between this Republic and the British Empire. No amount of arithmetical sophistry or legerdemain will ever convince the common sense of America that one vote is the equivalent of six votes. Our people understand voting too well for that. I hope that democracy will not stake its future and its fortunes upon its ability to demonstrate the truth of that self-evident absurdity. If six votes are not more than one vote, the British Empire ought not to ask it. If six votes are more than one vote, the British Empire ought not to have it. Either horn of the dilemma forbids our consent to this inequality, to this degradation. Why should red-blooded Americans hesitate to demand equality with the British Empire when Mr. Fielding declared in the Canadian Parliament that Canada had no more right to a vote in the league than the State of New York; when the editor of the Free Press published in Ontario condemned this inequality of voting power; when Mr. A. G. Gardner, late editor of the London News and a distinguished advocate of the league, asserted that the United States had just ground to complain of the proposed inequality of the voting power, and suggested that Great Britain should take the initiative in the establishment of such equality. Some Americans comfort themselves with the statement that the unequal voting power makes no difference in view of the requirements as to unanimous consent. The requirement of unanimous consent in respect to reports and recommendations touching international disputes is limited to the council. It is often said that the United States can protect itself in the council because nothing can be done except by unanimous agreement. It is true that the United States has a veto, an effective veto, in every controversy considered by the council in which the United States is not concerned, but it has no voice, it has no vote, it has no veto, in any controversy which concerns the United States. There is the rub. In all such controversies it is denied a vote and denied a veto. The requirement as to unanimous consent is of no avail when our interest, when our destiny, is involved. The requirement as to unanimous consent does not apply where disputes are appealed to the assembly. There the majority controls and six votes count for more than one. If Great Britain and the United States should be parties to the controversy, both would be denied a vote in the assembly. But the British Empire would still have five votes. Such an inequality, such a disparity, is as incompatible with the interest and the continued good will of the two nations as with the dignity and honor of the United States as a sovereign and independent nation. I am not willing to say by my vote that the British Empire is six times as good or six times as great as the United States of America. I am not willing to say by my vote that this puissant, that this matchless Republic is a sixth-rate power. I say this as one who had five ancestors in the struggle for American sovereignty and independence.

Mr. President, I shall vote to modify article 10. There are many uncertainties in connection with this league. Indeed, there is only one certainty, and that certainty looms lurid as the nether flames, and that is that article 10 obligates the United States to take part in every war that ever happens upon this planet. That is certain. That is certain unless we modify article 10, or unless we repudiate the moral obligation imposed by article 10. Only by treating article 10 as a scrap of paper can the United States escape a resort to war whenever a war anywhere shall be instituted that threatens the boundary lines of any nation upon the globe. Article 10 binds us to tax our people, to spend our money, to draft our boys, to shed their blood, to sacrifice their lives, in every war that ever happens involving the boundary lines of a member of this league, whether it be in Europe, in Asia, in Africa, or in the islands of the sea.

Mr. President, I do not like to bind the United States in advance to participate in all these wars, which concern neither our rights, our interests, nor our honor. I am not willing to draft our boys and send them over the sea to die upon the burning deserts of Arabia or upon the frozen tundras of Siberia in quarrels that concern us not. I would not sacrifice the life of one Oklahoma boy, I would not break the heart of one Oklahoma mother, to decide whether Greece or Serbia should own the Sanjak of Novi-Bazar, nor to confirm the clouded title of Japan to the pilfered Province of Shantung. It should never be forgotten that during the last 105 years there have been 52 bloody wars in Europe. The United States engaged in only two of these wars. A league of nations which would have reduced this number one-half, reduced it to 26, would have been a great blessing to Europe, but a league which would have involved the United States in 26 wars would have been a rather bloody blessing. Does not this warn us to heed the voice of Washington and beware of entangling alliances? The United States entered the recent war, and was able to determine that war in its own favor and in accordance with its own interests and purposes. Let us hope that the United States will never be obliged to enter another war, but if it should, let us hope that it will be able to decide such war in accordance with its interest, its purpose, and its honor. Faith in the chivalry and heroism of our soldiers, exemplified upon the fields of France and Flanders, renders such a conclusion beyond all doubt.

There is a possibility, however, that the pending league, unmodified, would extend the ancient European balance of power to Asia and to the Americas. If that should happen, and if history should not belie all its lessons and examples, it would result in the formation of a counter combination. The world would divide into two vast armed camps, and the issue in that event might possibly be rendered doubtful if the United States should commit itself in advance.

Mr. President, there are those who fear that the proposed arrangement is not a league of nations at all, that it is only an alliance, that it is an offensive and defensive alliance on the part of the Big Five, and that this alliance might degenerate into an oligarchy.

Mr. President, I am one of those who believe in a society of nations, and I hoped to see, and I still hope to see, a society of nations grow out of this war, a society of nations that will create an international court of justice. I would be willing to commit to that court of justice all justiciable questions. I think that I might consent to refer to that court questions which are denominated nonjusticiable if only moral sanctions were to be attached to the decisions, and if there should be no resort to armed force and to military power.

To my mind the phrase, "A league to enforce peace," is a contradication of terms. I hope the present arrangement will develop into a society of nations, a society of nations that would not only institute the sort of court I have mentioned but a society of nations that would constitute an international legislature, an international legislature vested with the power and charged with the duty of clarifying and codifying international law, rendering its principles distinct and certain.

I would be willing that the principles of international law which such a legislature should promulgate by unanimous consent should be accepted as binding upon all the members of the society. The principles of international law agreed upon by three-fourths of the States represented might constitute binding international law as between the States agreeing, but the principles of international law agreed to by only a majority should merely be published for the enlightened verdict and opinion of mankind. This might not immediately bring about a definitive code of international law which would be binding upon the conscience and the conduct of men, but it would set in operation forces which would lead to the evolution and to the final consummation of such a system of international jurisprudence and international justice. Mr. President, I devoutly desire the consummation of such an end and the realization of such an ideal.

I know that the people of the United States and that the people of the world, bent and bleeding with war, are praying to the God of nations to send them universal and perpetual peace. Mr. President, I sympathize with their prayers and with their heartfelt yearnings and aspirations. I am determined, both as a matter of duty and of choice, to aid the people in realizing these holy aspirations. The people everywhere are asking for a fish. We must take care not to give them a hissing serpent. The people everywhere are asking for an egg. We must take care not to give them a scorpion that will sting them to the death.

I am determined to do everything possible to promote peace and to prevent war. My chief concern is that whatever we shall do may contribute to the preservation of peace and to the prevention of war, and that it may not prove the highway into every war that ever happens upon this revolving planet. That, sir, is the object of my deepest solicitude for my country and for my countrymen. This solicitude explains my attitude and my course with respect to the league. The one tragedy that would be worse than war would be for our honest efforts to keep the peace to prove the means of involving us in endless wars. We should adopt every precaution that human foresight can devise to avert such a tragedy. In our desperate desire to take a step in the right direction we must use every possible precaution not to take a leap in the wrong direction. We must not set the dove of peace upon the dragon's nest of war. This is the counsel alike of prudence, of patriotism, and of humanity.

The distinguished originators of this league do not exemplify perfect faith in its efficacy to preserve the peace of the world. When President Wilson laid the first draft of the covenant before the commissioners in Paris he said:

> Armed force is in the background; and yet it is not in the background. If the moral forces of the world will not suffice to keep the peace of the world, physical force shall.

Physical force shall!

There, Mr. President, is a doubtful mark that looms as high as the heavens. But the President is too profound a historian to imagine or to assert that he could devise or that they had devised a sovereign remedy for war among the children of men.

Premier Clemenceau exemplified his doubt in the efficacy of the pending league when he secured or accepted the special alliance or treaty between the United States and France, a treaty under which we bind ourselves to go to the rescue and defense of France in case of an unprovoked attack on the part of Germany. If the premier of France had reposed implicit faith in the league of nations, if the premier of France had reposed as much faith in the league as we are bidden to entertain and exhibit, he would not have sought, neither would he have accepted, this special arrangement for the defense of France. He would have relied upon the league of nations to provide France with ample security and protection against her ancient and conquered foe.

Lloyd-George, in a recent speech in Parliament, indicated that he would hereafter expect, when the British Empire entered war, that the United States would enter the war, and would enter the war by virtue of the two facts that the British Empire had entered the war and that the United States was a member of the league. I do not know how much weight we should attach to an opinion of this sort.

But, Mr. President, our own country has not exhibited the implicit and trusting faith in the league of nations which the Senate is asked to exhibit. I refer now to the Army reorganization bill which is pending in the Senate and in the House of Representatives. This reorganization bill has the approval of Gen. March, the Chief of Staff. It has the approval of Mr. Baker, the Secretary of War. It is to be assumed that it is an administration measure. What does this bill provide? It provides that every able-bodied male person in the United States, between the ages of 18 and 45 years, shall be automatically drafted into the military service when the United States enters war; that 22,000,000 men shall be automatically drafted into the military service without any further action, without any further authorization, upon the part of the Congress.

What else? Before our entry into the war we had a standing Army of approximately 82,000 men. Under this administration Army bill now pending it is proposed, notwithstanding the league of nations, to create a standing Army in time of peace of 500,000 Regulars and to create a reserve of 750,000 men. This new Army is to cost $900,000,000 a year; is to cost about seven times as much as our Army cost before our entrance into the war; is to cost, if I remember correctly, three times as much as the entire German military establishment before the war. This new Army is to cost $200,000,000 more than the total expense of the Government of the United States for all purposes prior to the war, excepting only the Post Office Department, which pays its own way.

In addition to this vast and expensive Army in time of peace, we are to have a Navy costing $1,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. President, are these the first fruits of universal disarmament? Is this the evidence of our faith in the efficacy of the league to preserve peace and to prevent war? Are these vast preparations to be carried forward in the light of world democracy and universal disarmament and perpetual peace and the brotherhood of man and a return of the golden age?

I mention these facts as evidence of a want of faith on the part of certain high officials—which we are forbidden to share—in the infallible and entire efficacy of the proposed league to prevent war and perpetuate peace.

If those who framed and sanctioned and formulated the league of nations have exhibited so many proofs of their want of faith, should not the honest and earnest efforts of those who are seeking in good earnest to make this league a guaranty of peace and a preventive of war be viewed with temperance and with tolerance?

I am not willing to conceal the fact that I shall vote against the Army reorganization bill to which I have referred. I shall not vote to set up in America that militaristic system which we have sacrificed so much to tear down in Germany. I am not willing to welcome in this free Republic that foul demon of militarism which we have attempted to cast out of the German Empire.

Mr. President, the time may not have come when the Senate or the parliaments of other nations will consent to give the people themselves even an advisory voice in a declaration of war, but, sir, the stars in their courses are battling for this principle. This principle and its consummation are in the womb of the future. It is but a matter of time until governments will consent, consent perhaps with reluctance but will consent, to invest the people with some power and with some voice touching the mighty issues of peace and war. The time will come in the advance of democracy, which is as resistless as the tides of the sea and the revolutions of the planets, when sovereign peoples will refuse to be devoted to butchery and death without their own sovereign and voluntary consent.

In an earnest and perhaps in a premature effort to speed the coming of that day, that day of realized democracy, I have proposed the pending amendment.

I wish to have printed as part of my remarks an editorial from the Brooklyn Times in support of my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATOR GORE'S PROPOSAL.

The various amendments which would have effected a textual change in the treaty of Versailles were voted down in the Senate yesterday. The victory was not one for the administration forces, but for the block of Senators who fear the effect of opening up the whole question, and prefer to carry out the aims that have been developed as representing American sentiment by a series of frank reservations.

Senator GORE introduced a proposal that goes to the bottom of the question. He advised that no war be declared without a referendum and the approving vote of the people. No better safeguard of peace among civilized nations could exist than such a provision in the treaty. It may be urged against it that there are occasions when an attack suddenly made would necessitate immediate action by the Government. If the spirit of the league is what it professes to be, there is no great likelihood of such an event. The proposed machinery of the league allows for a period of discussion in cases where controversies trend toward war, and plebiscites could be speedily arranged and carried out while these discussions were in progress. Should a nation take advantage of the situation, make a sudden attack, however, the Government would be ready to meet it and could trust to the patriotism of the people to sustain it. That is a supposable case, to guard against which all the machinery of the league would be impotent. Senator GORE'S proposal is worthy of consideration, and if it can not be made an amendment to the treaty, it can at least be submitted to the league as a step in the direction of further minimizing the possibilities of war.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I intend to vote for the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I have during my service in this body many times voted with the Senator from Wisconsin, and in this instance I intend to do so again.

It had been my hope to vote against every amendment and every reservation offered to the peace treaty; it had been my intention to do so if I could conscientiously. That was my decided intention and predilection for a long time. Every inclination on my part was in that direction, and until recently I thought perhaps I could conscientiously do so and favor ratification of the peace treaty exactly as it is. In the last few weeks I have come to the conclusion, however, that I can not conscientiously vote to retain in the peace treaty Part XIII, or, at least, that I can not conscientiously vote to ratify the treaty without first voting to strike out that part.

I believe Part XIII is fraught with possibility of great danger. I believe it is teeming with possibilities of trouble. I believe it would provide a nursery for the germination, sprouting, and dissemination of socialistic and bolshevistic doctrines, which would tend to create unrest amongst those who are already dissatisfied, to make people believe that they have further and greater grievances when they already claim that they have much in the way of grievances, and would tend to create disturbance all over the world. I think the result would be that it would extend to the entire world the industrial disturbance, dissatisfaction, and unrest which now unhappily exists in this country.

I believe the body or tribunal provided for by Part XIII would be a hothouse of freakish, fantastic, and radical ideas which would take root in the minds of ignorant and unsuspecting people everywhere and cause them to take positions which they would not otherwise take and make unreasonable demands which they would not otherwise make. There are hundreds of thousands of workmen in this country who are ignorant aliens, who know nothing of our institutions, of our laws, of our traditions; who will give credence to anything that is told them that will tend to set them against the Government, against the established order of things, against organized society. They are easily misled and imposed upon. The investigation of the steel strike, which has been conducted by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, has disclosed that there are thousands of ignorant, illiterate foreigners working in the steel mills who are told by agitators and demagogues and who believe that the Government will soon take over the steel industry and run it, and grant all of their demands and pay any wages they may ask; that there are thousands of them who are told and who believe that all they have to do is to stay out on strike a little while longer and the workmen will then take control of the steel mills and do away with bosses and run the mills themselves and fix their own wages and their own hours of labor. This shows how credulous they are, and there are millions of such in this country, to say nothing of the rest of the world. They are easily imposed upon. They furnish a fertile field for the sowing of socialistic, anarchistic, bolshevistic seeds; and the opportunity is readily taken advantage of by designing men. So it will be, in my opinion, if the international labor conference provided for by Part XIII of the treaty be established. There would be sure to be in it men from all quarters of the world who would seize this opportunity for trouble.

If the world labor conference for which Part XIII of the peace treaty provides were established, I feel it safe to assume that some of the most radical elements of labor to be found in the world would be represented there. They would be sure to proclaim loudly their radical ideas, their extravagant demands, their unreasonable complaints. Doubtless Mr. Arthur Henderson would be a delegate from Great Britain. Doubtless some of the most socialistic and radical representatives of labor from France and Germany would be delegates.

The radical elements of labor in all countries of the world seem to be dominant now. I suppose the radical elements of labor in this country would probably select the representatives of labor from this country. I believe there is to be, on the part of each country participating, one representative of labor, one of capital, and two of the public. I suppose it is fair to assume that representatives of labor from this country would take very radical and advanced ground. All the labor leaders seem to take those grounds now, or nearly all of them, and such as do not take those grounds seem disposed to drift with the tide.

As to who might be the representatives of the people of this country, of the public, I have no idea; we have no assurance as to who or what they might be. Mr. B. M. Jewell was appointed a representative of the public in the late conference between capital and labor that assembled here in the behest of the President. He it is, I believe, who said a few weeks ago that, if a certain policy were pursued by the President, the railroads would be tied up so tight they would "never run again," which could only mean their physical destruction by dynamite or some other powerful agency.

Mr. William Bullitt and the former minister of the Gospel, Rev. Mr. Herron, have represented the people of this country, I believe, in some capacity in times past.

I do not say that such men would be delegated to represent the public in the proposed international labor conference, but we do not know what would be the character of the men who would represent the public. I do know the occasion would afford an opportunity for infinite harm. It would afford a forum for proclaiming every doctrine of unrest and evil. Plenty there be who would listen and believe.

I think the scheme a fanciful, socialistic creation which is fraught with great danger, and I am not willing to vote to ratify the peace treaty with that provision in it if it can be eliminated, and for that reason I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], which would strike out of the peace treaty Part XIII, the part which provides for an international labor body of vast powers.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I very greatly regret that the condition of my health is such as to have kept me from the Senate Chamber for a number of days, and that this morning, although I think the Senate has practically held this measure until to-day in order to give me an opportunity to express my views, I am still far from being in any condition to endure the fatigue or to rally the energies necessary properly to present this question either as its importance demands or even as my own poor abilities ought to be represented. I shall have to ask the indulgence of the Senate, therefore, if I proceed in a somewhat leisurely fashion, and if what I say may not be as well connected or as forcefully put as the dignity of the occasion and the importance of the subject demand.

We are about to vote upon a proposition to strike out Part XIII of the German peace treaty. Part XIII of the German peace treaty is in reality part and parcel of the league of nations covenant, the league of nations covenant, as we have spoken of it, constituting the first part of the German peace treaty, and the labor question, which we are now discussing, constituting the thirteenth part. It has a very proper number, if there is anything in the old superstition that 13 is unlucky.

Part XIII was not submitted at the time the so-called league covenant or constitution was submitted. I believe it was withheld at that time for the purpose, if possible, of diverting attention from it and of bringing about the very state of affairs which now confronts us. The state or condition is that the attention of the country has been riveted upon the provisions of article 10 and article 13 and upon certain other provisions of the peace treaty, and Part XIII, which has to do with the labor proposition, has apparently been regarded as immaterial; and yet, sir, it is the most revolutionary, the most dangerous, and the most infamous of all the dangerous and infamous provisions of this document, which proposes to change the form and structure of the American Government and to betray the rights of the American people.

Every effort is being made to force this treaty to a vote; to force it to a vote without an opportunity for the American people even to understand its provisions. The cry is Haste! Haste! Ratify! Ratify at once; accept without deliberation! Why this haste? There never was a man yet who had a gold brick which he was trying to dispose of who was not anxious to make a quick bargain. There never was a man with honest goods who was not anxious to have a thorough examination. If this treaty contains the virtues that its proponents claim, then every day of discussion will add to their strength and every hour of investigation will bring forth more clearly their shining and glorious qualities; but if it will not bear the acid test of investigation, then its proponents must have a hasty consideration and a very prompt vote. So we were told before the original draft of the original constitution, now called a covenant, was presented that it ought not even to be discussed, at least until the President had returned and had shed light upon the subject for the benefit of the darkened intellects of the Congress and the country.

Again, in consonance with the same policy, when the President started back to Europe on March 4, I believe it was, he said publicly that he proposed to return to Europe and to tell the people of Europe that the people of the United States were for this league, although there was not 1 per cent of the people of the United States that ever had any opportunity to know what was in the league, and that he proposed to so intertwine and interweave the conditions of this covenant with the conditions of peace that we could not dissect them apart, the object and purpose plainly being to deprive the Senate of the opportunity of exercising its constitutional right and to compel it to accept an instrument in which it did not believe, which it did not think to be just, and to put upon it the hard condition of rejecting peace and perpetuating a state of war. It was the boldest declaration of a proposed attempt to deprive a coordinate branch of the opportunity to exercise its constitutional functions that has ever fallen from the pen or the lips of an American Executive.

But, Mr. President, the situation has eventuated a little differently than was anticipated. The world is at peace; peace is an accomplished fact. If we were to ratify the peace treaty to-day by the vote of the Senate, it would not in any substantial degree change existing conditions. We are free to take whatsoever time we need without injury to the public and without perpetuating an actual state of war, whatever may be the technical state; and we can wipe out that technical state by a resolution of Congress to-morrow without the slightest danger to the Republic or without yielding a single right we may desire to enforce. So that it is mere chicanery put upon the public when they are told that we must ratify the peace treaty in order to have a condition of peace.

Again, we are told that we must make haste in order that business conditions may be settled. What business conditions, I pray you? Is it our foreign commerce? The argosies of the nations are moving back and forth across the seas with as complete freedom of intercourse as they ever had in the history of the world, the solitary exception to that being where embargoes have been placed by orders of our allies against the ships landing at the ports of certain countries with which we are technically at peace and have always been technically at peace. I refer, of course, to Russia. There is no interference with trade except the interference that is made by the unlawful mandate of a body of men over in Europe to whose commands we seem to be a party, or at least trucklingly subservient.

But some say that the declaration of peace will bring stability to business; that if we will adopt the league of nations we will inspire the world with confidence.

Mr. President, we will inspire with confidence the international financier who has invested his money in the rotten securities of Europe, and if you will withdraw that force from the elements that are back of this league you will withdraw the most potential force that is there to-day or that has been there from the first—the gentleman who made his investments in European securities, either private or public, and who now desires to have those securities underwritten by the United States and indorsed by the blood and tears of the American soldier and the American mother of the American soldier.

I affirm, sir, that the rejection of this league of nations is the thing that would inspire with confidence the real business of this country, the American banker as contradistinguished from the international banker, the American banker who expects to make his money by dealing honestly with the American people instead of the international banker who looks to foreign fields that he expects to harvest, and who sees a golden crop that his hands long to gather. I affirm, sir, that to the American banker who expects to do business in America you can do nothing of a more disturbing nature than to adopt this league of nations, and you can do nothing that will bring him more confidence and peace of mind than to reject it. And why? Because if you adopt the covenant of the league of nations the domestic banker, the American banker, knows that you have contracted to become a party to every war of the world. He therefore knows that there lurk in Europe and in Asia and in Africa, in every part of the world, latent dangers or irritating causes which may at any moment bring about a condition of war, that you have multiplied by 10,000 the chances of war, and he knows that there is nothing in all the world so disturbing to business as the prospect of war. You have so disturbed the mind of the American banker and the American business man when you bring about a condition in which our affairs, financial and political, are so intertwined with the affairs of Europe and Asia that every disturbance there must be immediately and directly reflected here. You can not escape it.

Suppose that we were to-day to withdraw from the league, make our peace, and say to all the world that America intends to look after her own affairs, that she will not be a party to European wars, that she will not be a party to Asiatic controversies; that here, within her seagirt shores, relying on her own strength and responding only to her own liabilities, she will continue to grow and prosper. There is not a business man in the United States, there is not a financier in the United States, who would not recognize in that fact a guaranty of security for his investments honestly made in this country. So that when this talk is put forward that we must rush this treaty through in order to create business stability, it is the dishonest cry of the dishonest man putting forward a false argument in support of a false issue.

It is proposed, sir, to change the very structure of our Government, and we intend to rush it through without giving the American people the slightest chance to express their own opinions. Men may stand in this Senate, or they may stand in other places, and say they represent the voice of the American people; but the American people never have had an opportunity to utter that voice, and the American people have not yet had presented to them the issues that are really wrapped up in this proposed treaty.

We might as well talk plainly. To begin with, no man can understand this document unless he is a great lawyer, or the equivalent of a great lawyer—I mean when he is thrown back upon his own resources to analyze it. Moreover, in addition to being a great lawyer he ought to be a great international lawyer, and in addition to both he ought to have a profound knowledge of ancient and modern history and to have been a close student of the treaties now governing the nations of the world. How many men living fill that definition? How many men in this Senate fill it? I do not claim, for my part, that I fill these qualifications. Every time I turn my attention to this document I feel the lack of ability, the lack of training, the lack of knowledge pressing upon me as a heavy burden. Of course, there is the cock-sureness of the ignorant, which may be consoling to some individuals, but I believe I have never been guilty of thinking I was able to solve all the difficulties within the four corners of this remarkable document.

What the people can understand, if you will give them an opportunity to understand them, are the principles involved. I have the utmost respect for the intelligence of the American people, and if we will submit those principles to them in a clear way and let them discuss them until they have an opportunity to make up their minds what those principles are, then, and not until then, will they have had an opportunity to form an opinion. I say that it is an outrage upon decency that this thing is to be forced through before the American people have an opportunity to vote upon it.

I heard a great publicist, one of the great men of this country, say the other day that technically the Senate of the United States had every right to pass upon this treaty and technically the President had every right to negotiate this treaty, but that morally neither the President nor the Senate had the right to confirm and ratify and put this treaty upon the country until the people had had an opportunity to express themselves, for, said he, "It is a repudiation of our old traditions; it is a reversal of all those principles that the people have held dear; it is a denial of the things we have heretofore regarded as axiomatic." No man in public life was elected on this issue. The President was not elected upon it. The Members of the Senate were not elected upon it. No political party ever passed upon it. Now, the people of the United States have a moral right to a vote upon it, and that, sir, is what should be given them. That, sir, is what in the end they will have; but in the interval we will have entangled them in a web of European and Asiatic diplomacy and conspiracy from which extrication may be difficult.

So far as I am concerned, I intend to submit to this Senate and to the Congress a proposition to give the people of the United States a chance to cast an advisory vote upon this question, which, in very truth, undertakes to undermine the citadels of the temple of liberty that they have so long been building, and which seeks in a cowardly way to avoid the terms of the Constitution and to nullify its sacred precepts.

We heard a rumble yesterday at the elections. We on this side of the Chamber, gentlemen, may go off in a corner and hold a meeting with ourselves and resolve that the league of nations had nothing to do with it, but it is my opinion that it had much to do with it, and the only place where we saved our skins was where we rallied the cohorts of John Barleycorn and raised the glorious issue of "free booze" to a point where all other issues were obscured.

Mr. President, I think it was 53 days ago that Mr. Bullitt testified before the Foreign Relations Committee. I do not know much about Mr. Bullitt, but what I do know is of a favorable character. At least, it does not lie in the mouths of the proponents of this league to cast aspersions upon him or to question either his integrity or his intelligence, for he was selected by their side of this proposition to help write the league of nations for us and for the world. He is their agent. He was their selection. He bears the brand of their approval, and the certificate he had in his pocket was signed by them. Fifty-three days ago he testified before the Foreign Relations Committee, and this testimony, so far as I know, has never up to this date been denied by the parties concerned. When the representative of the press asked Mr. Lansing what he had to say in regard to Mr. Bullitt's testimony he said he was going fishing. Fifty-three days have gone by, and if to-day they were all to deny Bullitt's testimony, I would take Bullitt's statement, because they have allowed the 53 days to go by. When it takes a man 53 days to deny a proposition of this kind, that is too long a preparation for the presentation of the simple truth.

Let us see what was said by the Secretary of State. I will read now from the testimony given before the Foreign Relations Committee by Mr. Bullitt:

Mr. BULLITT. I do not think that Secretary Lansing is at all enthusiastic about the league of nations as it stands at present. I have a note of a conversation with him on the subject, which, if I may, I will just read, without going into the rest of that conversation, because it bears directly on the issue involved.

This was a conversation with the Secretary of State at 2.30 on May 19. The Secretary sent for me. It was a long conversation, and Mr. Lansing in the course of it said:

"Mr. Lansing then said that he personally would have strengthened greatly the judicial clauses of the league of nations covenant, making arbitration compulsory. He also said that he was absolutely opposed to the United States taking a mandate in either Armenia or Constantinople; that he thought that Constantinople should be placed under a local government, the chief members of which were appointed by an international committee."

This is a matter, it seems to me, of some importance in regard to the whole discussion, and therefore I feel at liberty to read it, as it is not a personal matter.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a note of the conversation made at the time?

Mr. BULLITT. This is a note which I immediately dictated after the conversation. [Reading:]

"Mr. Lansing then said that he, too, considered many parts of the treaty thoroughly bad, particularly those dealing with Shantung and the league of nations. He said: 'I consider that the league of nations at present is entirely useless. The great powers have simply gone ahead and arranged the world to suit themselves. England and France, in particular, have gotten out of the treaty everything that they wanted, and the league of nations can do nothing to alter any of the unjust clauses of the treaty except by unanimous consent of the members of the league, and the great powers will never give their consent to changes in the interests of weaker peoples.'

"We then talked about the possibility of ratification by the Senate. Mr. Lansing said: 'I believe that if the Senate could only understand what this treaty means, and if the American people could really understand, it would unquestionably be defeated, but I wonder if they will ever understand what it lets them in for.' He expressed the opinion that Mr. KNOX would probably really understand the treaty, and that Mr. LODGE would; but that Mr. LODGE's position would become purely political, and therefore ineffective. He thought, however, that Mr. KNOX might instruct America in the real meaning of it."

Mr. KNOX has instructed America as to the meaning of it. But it takes many months for discussions of a legal character to be so conveyed to 110,000,000 people that they understand those principles and are able to make a practical application. Mr. KNOX's instructions are that we ought to repudiate this entire document, make a peace, come home, and live as we have lived in the past, true to our traditions, true to our Constitution, and true to our flag. I think I epitomize the position of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who is present and who, I hope, will correct me if I have misstated him in any way.

Mr. President, a little earlier Mr. Bullitt said:

It is no secret that Mr. Lansing, Gen. Bliss, and Mr. Henry White objected very vigorously to numerous provisions of the treaty.

And those gentlemen have not come forward to deny that statement. So that you have nearly all the men there were over there representing America opposing, and saying, "This is not a proper treaty"; and without these things even being pointed out to the Foreign Relations Committee, and without the testimony of those gentlemen here, the demand is that we shall rush this document through, and back of the movement a propaganda financed as no propaganda was ever financed in the history of the world, systematically carried forward by paid agents planted in every State, and who have gone from State to State with the money of Mr. Taft's league in their pockets, every effort being made to deprive the people of an opportunity to know.

Among the things they do not know about, although a number of very clear and incisive speeches have been made on the floor of the Senate, is Part XIII, and Members of the Senate do not know about it. They retire to the cloakroom; they play the part of the snapping turtle, who, when disturbed, pulls in his head, pulls in his tail, shuts down his shell, and closes up. They are determined to vote for this league whether it is right or wrong. They are committed. Their massive minds are in a static condition and can not be moved. Argument does not appeal to them. "It is a Democratic measure," say some of them. "The President demands it," say others of them. Well, it is not a Democratic measure, for no Democratic convention ever passed on it. And if they are doing it simply because the President declares they should do it, without the exercise of their independent judgment, they ought to go and live in a country where one man does the thinking for all the people. They ought not to sit in a body under a Constitution that makes it their duty to exercise an independent judgment, and they ought not to hold up their hands and swear to God they will sustain and uphold that Constitution and then lay down their judgment and transform themselves into a mere servile brood fawning at the feet of Executive authority.

Mr. President, one further preliminary word, and then I want to pay some attention to Part XIII. A number of gentlemen are solacing their souls with the fact that they will not vote for amendments, but they are going to do the same sort of thing by voting for reservations. They state that no matter how good an amendment is it might be defeated, and it is defeated by the votes of men who say that every principle contained in the amendment is wise and just and proper and necessary, but they will not vote for it because it is an amendment. They will, however, salve their consciences and anoint their tender sensibilities by a reservation.

Now, let us see what real sense there is in that position. If a reservation is the equivalent of an amendment in its effect, then the amendment must be the equivalent of the reservation in its effect, and two things that are the equivalents each of the other are exact equals; and if they do accomplish the same purpose and bring about the same end, then why is it that men will adopt one and refuse the other? I will tell you why. A reservation is the last resort of cowardice. It is the hole through which the little soul of a fellow who is not willing to stand up and front the people seeks to escape from responsibility. It is the crack in the fence through which a hound dog always seeks to escape. The mastiff turns at bay and fights, or else he takes the fence at a jump. He does not go cringing and crawling and whining; and some of them have their heads stuck in the crack now and do not know whether to back up or go ahead.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair feels that he will have to call the Senator from Missouri to order.

Mr. REED. For what reason?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If that is not imputing to Senators conduct or motives unworthy or unbecoming, the Chair does not know what is.

Mr. REED. The Chair is putting a construction upon what I am saying that I do not intend to imply at all. I am simply using figurative language in painting a situation, and not to attack any individual.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, the Chair thinks it is going too far.

Mr. REED. Of course, if the Chair thinks so I will use other language.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri objected the other day when another Senator used language which he characterized as unparliamentary.

Mr. REED. I will get another metaphor that is more pleasant. I have not the slightest desire to reflect upon individual Senators. I am discussing a situation that is presented here, and I think the voluntary calling to order by the Chair is very unkind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not mean to be unkind, but the Senator charged a body of Senators with being snapping turtles and dogs and things of that kind.

Mr. REED. No; I have not charged them with being dogs or snapping turtles. I used a comparison that came into my mind to express an idea, and not to describe them at all; and the text of my speech will so show, and it will be printed without any corrections.

When I say that men close their minds like snapping turtles I do not call them snapping turtles. If I said they acted like angels, I would not mean to say they were angels, for that would be equally far from the truth.

Mr. KING. Will it disturb the Senator if I ask a question at this point?

Mr. REED. Not if it has anything to do with what I have been saying.

Mr. KING. Indeed it has. The Senator has been criticizing some who have preferred reservations to amendments. So that I may make myself very clear I wish to call the Senator's attention to Part XIII, which we are now considering. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has moved to strike that part from the treaty. I have had the honor to offer a reservation which states in substance that the United States declines to enter into that part of the treaty, to be bound by it, or to participate in it at all. It strikes me, and I am quite sure that it is the view of many Senators, that if other nations signatory to the treaty want Part XIII, that is their business. Let them have it. We therefore ought not textually to amend by striking out Part XIII. If we do not want to participate in it we can reach that point by reservation. Does not the Senator think that position is sound?

Mr. REED. No; I do not. I do think, though, that in the particular case which the Senator now states it can fairly be said that if he wants to allow Part XIII to become the rule among the nations of the earth, we alone being excepted, there is a difference between that and striking it out. However, if it were stricken out and the other nations wanted it, they could still get it.

The difficulty with the proposition is, I would say, by way of clearing this one matter up and then passing on, that if Part XIII is so iniquitous that we should not enter into it, we should not help to set it up by making it a part of the machinery of the league of nations. If it be socialism and anarchy here to us, we ought not to help set it up in other parts of the world.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes; though I do want to get through.

Mr. McCORMICK. I only desire to ask the Senator if he believes we ought to take water and wash our hands of it? Would not that be enough?

Mr. REED. I do not think so. I never did think much of Pontius Pilate——

Mr. McCORMICK. That is what I wanted to bring out.

Mr. REED. Who said, "Take ye Him and crucify Him." I do not think much of the statesmanship which says, "There is a thing that is utterly bad and must not be put upon our country, but we will help create an organization and we will confer upon that organization the power and the authority to bind all the other nations of the world."

Let us come back to the proposition of the distinction between reservations and amendments. The reservationist says his reservation accomplishes the same thing. Men have sat here and voted against the Shantung amendment, have voted against other amendments; but they have done it because they are going to put in a reservation. If the reservation accomplishes the same thing as an amendment, why not vote for the amendment? If the amendment is the same thing as a reservation, why not vote for the amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARDING in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Take the reservation offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. It does not accomplish the same thing, but it accomplishes everything, so far as our country is concerned, that we can ask for. It frees us from any responsibility or connection with Part XIII and simply says "the balance of you may make your own arrangements to suit yourselves; we are not running your end of it, but we will not be a party to it."

Mr. REED. I have already stated my proposition on that point, and, I think, correctly. I think the Senator is not at variance with me in regard to that particular provision. I stated then that if it is such an iniquitous thing that we will not adopt it ourselves, we ought not to help to set up international socialism elsewhere. If we do not want international socialism to thrust its ugly, scaly head into the public life of this country, we ought not to create the serpent to wind its coils around other countries. If we do not want it in our own country, we ought not to help create it or sanction it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If we decline to connect the United States with it, if we distinctly state that we will not assume the responsibilities provided for or be a party to the provisions covered by Part XIII, how are we creating it? Are we not simply leaving it for other countries to determine whether it is a thing which will help them? Something might help them which would not help us.

Mr. REED. Ah, Mr. President, but the Senator of course does not——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to go one step further. Is it a responsibility that we ought to carry, so far as they are concerned?

Mr. REED. That just depends upon our viewpoint. If we are going to return to the old American doctrine of coming back home and attending to our own business and letting Europe alone, then we could well say, "We propose to have nothing to do with your arrangements regarding international socialism."

But that is not the position of the Senator, and that is not the position that we are taking in this league. We are setting up an instrumentality here to govern the world, and we are assuming the responsibility of interfering in the affairs of the world; but we come to one proposition so obnoxious that we can not swallow it, so we reserve the right to throw that out, though at the same time the organization we create is authorized to go straight on and, for the rest of the world, set up international socialism. Now, the Senator knows if that is being done by the league of nations internationally, it will eventually force its way into this country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator if it is not at least true that the reservation of the Senator from Utah takes us entirely out from it, frees us from contributing anything toward the expense, frees us from the responsibility of the distribution of any of their publications, and that even socialism might help in Russia if it is better than what they have?

Mr. REED. I think not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then let me ask the Senator a further question. If he is so opposed to our undertaking to dictate and interfere in European affairs, ought not he at least to be pleased with the action as to Part XIII where we, as a member of it, by reservation undertake to define its application to us?

Mr. REED. I would rather have the United States left out by a reservation than be put in. What I am complaining about is that Senators say, "This is international socialism; it is a wicked thing; it is a serpent that crushes liberty and destroys rights. Now, we will not permit it to come into our own country, but we will help set up an organization that proposes to sanction it by international law and by custom, and we will create it every other place." And if you do that, I warn you that it will twist itself about the columns of the temple of liberty in this country.

Instead of voting for that, why not vote to strike it out? What is the reason? Now, I come to the only reason that is ever offered or that I have ever heard offered for a reservation. They say if we amend the treaty, it has to go back to the peace conference and that all of the delegates have to be reassembled. The men who say that know it is not true. They know it is not true, because the peace conference is now in session and has never adjourned. It has been in session for many months. All they would have to do in the world would be to send back the treaty to that conference, now in session, and they know it. Yet from high places the people of the United States have been told that they would have to reassemble the peace conference.

But some of them say you have to call in Germany as part of these matters; that is, of course, incorrect, because Germany is not a party to the league of nations, and as to any amendment to the league of nations proper, as we talk of it, Germany does not have to be called in for she is not a party to it.

But suppose that Germany had to be called in, let us apply some common sense to the proposition. How long would it take to call Germany in and how long would Germany dare to hesitate to agree to any amendment that the rest of the nations had agreed to, particularly when that amendment does not substantially check her fortunes? In one moment we are told that Germany is so powerful and so potential that we dare not go back to her with a mere verbal change in an instrument that does not affect her fortunes, lest she rise up and refuse to any longer agree to this treaty. In the next breath we are told that Germany lies prostrate and will for the next half century. The fact is that Germany desires this peace more than anybody and Germany desires a league of nations more than any nation on earth.

Gentlemen have had the impudence in various parts of this country and the unkindness in this sacred Chamber to intimate that those who want to change the treaty or to reject the league of nations are pro-German. Yet, sir, they know that there is not a German statesman of any size in the world who has not advocated the league of nations. They have been advocating the league of nations and the 14 points ever since they surrendered. I can bring here to the Senate and read from their declarations by the hour to that effect. The German delegates to the peace conference and the German delegates to the international labor conference came with the same demand upon their lips. No man here will challenge that statement. If there is such a man, I would like to have him challenge it now.

Mr. President, what is the genesis of Part XIII? I assert that Part XIII of the treaty was born in the brain of the international socialist, anarchist, and Bolshevist; that it is the realization very largely of his dream that he has entertained for years. I wish, if my strength permits me, to bring that to the proof. I say that the convention now assembled in the city of Washington has in it as representatives the very men who have taught the infamous doctrine of the Bolshevist of Russia and the international anarchist who has made Europe an unsafe place.

There has been in existence for many years an international society. It has taught the doctrine as its fundamental that labor not only lies at the basis of all progress, but that the laboring man, being the basis of all progress, has a right to control the world. They have taught the doctrine that capital has controlled governments, and that it is the business of the men who work with their hands and their bodies to organize and control and take over the governments of the earth, and through international societies to create a condition whereby they can defy and disregard all the governments of the earth. That is their fundamental; that is their doctrine. They taught—and they taught it with tons of literature—that when war should be declared it was the business of the laboring men to refuse to fight each other in different countries; to go into a state of rebellion; that there was a brotherhood of men who happened to work with their hands, and that that holy brotherhood should control this entire world. If I had the time this afternoon, I could put in document after document and book after book in demonstration of what I have said.

The last of these international societies, save the one that I am going to call attention to, met in 1912, and went to the very limit in the declaration of these principles. When war was declared, to the astonishment and disgust of these reformers, the German socialist and the French socialist said, notwithstanding his international obligation, he would adhere to his own country. So they became powerless for the time being to carry out their scheme. Afterwards, however, the same crowd of men, speaking generally, met in Switzerland. You remember that to that Berne convention Arthur Henderson, member of the British Parliament, was a delegate. British firemen refused to fire the boilers of the ship that was going to carry him and his fellow delegates. Mr. Arthur Henderson is in Washington, or, at least, is a delegate accredited to the convention now sitting in Washington. The firemen's strike seems to be over so far as he is concerned.

Mr. KING. Possibly he came on an American ship.

Mr. REED. Possibly so. These conventions sowed the seed that resulted in breaking the Russian lines. The Russian soldiers were convinced that they had the right to refuse to obey the authorities over them. So they broke the Russian lines right in the very crisis of this war.

This same crowd of gentlemen introduced their seductive doctrine—seductive to the ignorant—into the Italian Army, which was one of the great forces that produced the Italian debacle. They introduced it into the English Army until it became a menace, and also into the French Army. They were working assiduously, night and day, to undermine the military forces of those countries; and if they had then succeeded Germany would have triumphed, and the so-called saving of the world for democracy would have ended in a bloody catastrophe.

Mr. President, these gentlemen got together at Berne, Switzerland. They met, I believe, on February 2, 1919. I hold in my hand a book entitled, "The Spirit of the International at Berne," by John de Kay, published for free distribution. Mr. John de Kay introduces himself by saying that he is an internationalist and a socialist. He attended this convention; and I am asking the attention of the Senators who are present to the fact that every principle laid down by that convention at Berne is found in Part XIII, recognized expressly and adopted, or, if not adopted, in substance pledged for the future.

First, let us look at the magnitude of this organization. It is declared on pages 6 and 7 that before the war they had a membership of "between ten and twelve million affiliated through their national sections." Mr. de Kay states:

> It is now still possible to make such a computation for some countries. The British delegation represented four and a half million members; both French delegations represent 1,000,000 members; the Canadian delegation represented 500,000 members. * * * The German delegations came in the name of all the social and labor votes of their country, numbering about 12,000,000 voters in the socialist majority and about 3,000,000 of the independent party. The Lettish, Esthonian, and Georgian delegations represented a great part of their people. The Russian figures are completely unknown. They may be 1,000,000 or 10,000,000. * * *
> Instead, then, of speaking of 12,000,000 people, we may, without the least exaggeration, speak of more than 50,000,000 of men and women.

He states that—

> The French and German delegates met, not as enemies and not as friends, but as fellow men who were common sufferers from a common source, and who recognized that this source was an international caste which throughout the world had maintained its international and identical interest, while it had found the realization of its temporary and material ends by exploiting the sentiments and nationalism of the masses who in all nations have a common interest, and are nationals in nothing except tradition, name, and prejudice.

As I pass on you will observe that the whole of the teaching of these gentlemen are that there shall be no nations; that we are to be drawn into one common world government, and that world government to be run by labor.

Now, I wish to say here that there does not stand upon this floor a man who has more consistently fought for the cause of union labor than myself. In so far as labor ever comes asking for things that it justly ought to have, I intend to support it; but when it is proposed that labor shall break down our Government or a part of it, when it is proposed that in the name of labor men shall assail the Constitution of the United States and shall set up a part of the people to rule over all of the people, at that point, as an American citizen, I protest.

I wish to continue presenting these views. Mr. de Kay constantly attacks every other class except the men who labor with their hands. He speaks sneeringly of "hard-working diplomats, lawyers, armament makers, and pirates of high finance." Then he makes this declaration:

> These great bodies—
> That is, the labor organizations—
> should, without delay, create a world parliament—
> A world parliament; get that—
> a world parliament standing for the interests of the masses of labor in all lands and dedicated to a protection of the general social welfare without distinction as to race, nationality, or religion. Such a world parliament should meet three or four times each year in the capitals of various nations. It should be provided from the general funds with its own public buildings and expenses; it should elect its executive board of action and confide to such a board or cabinet the powers to carry out decisions, summon the parliament in the event of a crisis, and by the decisions of such a parliament the labor and socialism of the whole world should abide, and upon its mandates they should act.

And that, sir, is written in Part XIII; every principle embodied in the statement I have read is in Part XIII of the pending treaty.

> There is no time to be lost in the creation of this unique and only body through which exploitation and wars may be abolished. * * *
> This is not the time to foster revengeful measures against one nation or another or to inflict arrogance upon vanquished men whose despair will lead to a form of social upheaval which will cross all national boundaries. This is to-day only an eventuality, but it may soon be a reality. * * *
> As one who has associated with the plutocrats and who knows their arrogance and blindness and how reluctant they are to believe in anything except the omnipotence of their own powers, I feel that they will only act in any new or reasonable way under pressure of the most direct and irresistible sort. * * *
> Gradually the feeling is gaining ground that the policy of negotiation is failing and concurrently with this sentiment the ideas of constitutional action are passing from the minds of men. This is an ominous sign which he who runs may read. It bears a sinister inscription which must not be ignored.
> Let there be no mistake as to what these words mean. If there is to be "no more war," it means complete disarmament for every nation. And if "all is possible" is not to be translated into universal violence, it means that those who now rule mankind through industrialism and governments must by conciliation and negotiation enable the toilers throughout the world to realize without delay their natural and legitimate demands. These are set forth with great moderation in the resolutions and speeches here published.

They are in this book.

It will be well for the ones in whose hands the fate of mankind temporarily rests in Paris to take into full account the moderate demands of the patient men who were represented at Berne and who represent the class which is in the future to rule the world.

Who represent the class which is in the future to rule the world!

I commend these pages to the consideration of all who have any voice in the affairs of men, with the solemn warning that unless the message of the international at Berne is heeded without delay there will be no escape from violence and dictatorships; and, contrary to official calculations, the violence will precede the dictatorships.

This calamity should and may still be averted on the lines I have indicated. If these are ignored, any physical force which can be employed will be no more potent than a man raising his hand to stay a hurricane, which unfortunately goes its way and carries everything before it.

He has put in one paragraph the demands of the Berne people. Mr. President, what are some more of these demands?

The league of nations must further prevent all economic war by the establishment of free trade.

This is one of the resolutions adopted:

The functions of the league shall include the establishment, development, and enforcements of an international labor charter.

And the international labor charter is Part XIII, now submitted to us.

This is another of their resolutions:

The conference urges the socialists of the whole world to close their ranks and not to deliver the revolutionary peoples into the hands of international reaction.

He calls upon them to do their utmost to secure the triumph of social democracy. Then they present their demands to a labor charter. They say:

The limits which capitalism has reached are very different in the various countries. One of the dangers here involved is that industry and labor of the more progressive countries are injured by a system of sweated labor in the more backward countries. The need to establish an international standard of labor legislation—

That is what we are doing—establishing an international standard of labor legislation.

Now, listen to this: If I were to say to the people of America that it is coldly proposed by those who bring forward Part XIII that labor unions, getting together through their representatives, should pass labor resolutions regulating labor conditions throughout the world, and that that is to constitute international law, there would be some doubt about it; and yet that is the proposition, I shall demonstrate, of the Berne convention and the proposition of the men who drew Part XIII—that a labor resolution shall constitute international law and bind the world. I am coming to that in a minute.

The Berne conference having taken into consideration the resolutions adopted by the international trade-union conferences of Leeds and Berne, and without prejudice to any more far-reaching resolutions which may be adopted by trade-unions, demands that the following minimum requirements, which are already carried out in part in some countries, shall be converted into a code of international law by the league of nations on the conclusion of peace.

Then they have their eight-hour day, which they specify; forty-eight hours a week; time to begin work and time to close work; 36 hours from Saturday to Monday—less time where men are employed in dangerous trades—prohibition of the use of poisonous articles in work.

In all districts where there is home work, wage boards, representatives of employers and workers, shall be instituted, with the duty of fixing legal rates of wages. The rates of wages shall be posted up in the work places. Immigrant workers shall enjoy the same rights as the workers of the country into which they immigrate as regards joining and taking part in the work of trade-unions, including the right to strike. Any interference with the exercise of the right of combination and association should be punished.

Now, this is all to be international law.

Every foreign worker shall have a right to the wages and conditions of work agreed to between the trade-unions and the employers of his trade. Where no such agreements exist foreign workers shall have a right to the wages customary in the locality for their trade. * * *

Immigration shall not be prohibited in a general way. The rule shall not affect—

(a) The right of any State to restrict immigration temporarily in a period of economic depression in order to protect the workers of that country as well as the foreign immigrant workers.

But outside of that they propose to say to the sovereign nations of the world that any man can go from any country to another country and live there; and why not? If all barriers are to be broken down; if, instead of nationalism, we are to have internationalism; if we are to pull down the American flag and run up an international rag; if we are to destroy our Government for the benefit of the socialists and anarchists of other countries, then why not the thing they demand here, namely, that all men can go from one part of the world to another and settle and do as they please?

Then they graciously concede the right to the State to prohibit immigration temporarily for the purpose of protecting health:

These exceptions can, however, only be admitted in agreement with the commission provided for in article 15.

That is to say, before a State can do these things, before it can introduce these exceptions, it must get the permission of a commission to be set up by the labor organizations of the world—not the labor, but the socialists—for I take this occasion to exculpate the great body of American union labor from the charge that they are international socialists, or that they are anything but good American citizens, and, although they have made many mistakes, and although they sometimes make mistakes in their officers, it is because at heart they are good American citizens that so many times outrages have been prevented by the men themselves.

They demand that the States shall contract to carry out these propositions, and add this:

Moreover, the contracting States shall convoke as speedily as possible an international conference charged to take effective measures against the reduction of value of wages and assure their payment in money which has not depreciated in value.

* * * * * * *

All workers shall be insured by the State against industrial accidents. * * * A system of unemployment insurance shall be set up in every country.

Now, article 13:

A special international code of law for the protection of seamen shall be established. This code shall be drawn up with the collaboration of the seamen's unions.

International law is to be drawn in collaboration with a labor union—not with all the people who have to live under it; not with the great mass of humanity who are concerned, but with a few of them who are organized. That is all there is to Bolshevism. Bolshevism is the control of the entire people by a class of the people. They simply say that the man who labors and is organized shall run the Government and have everything, and that the men who are not so situated shall be controlled and governed by them. That is all there is to Russian Bolshevism, sovietism, or any of the other "isms," including anarchism.

I want to read, in connection with just what I did read, section 13 of these resolutions:

The enforcement of these provisions shall, in the first place, rest with the labor departments of each State and their industrial inspectors. The trade-unions shall assist in the effective enforcement of the labor laws. Employers who employ at least five workers of foreign tongues shall be required by law to post up in the mother tongue of such workers all labor regulations.

Now I read Part XV:

With a view to the carrying out of this treaty and the further promotion of international labor regulations, the contracting States shall appoint a permanent commission—

Now, get this—consisting in equal parts of representatives of the States which are members of the league of nations and of the international trade-union federation. The commission shall prepare the ground for and convoke conferences of representatives of the contracting States, which shall be held every year to promote international labor legislation. One-half of the voting members of the conference shall consist of representatives of the organized workers of every country. The conferences shall have power to adopt binding resolutions within the scope of the powers conferred upon them.

And, as said elsewhere, they are to have the effect of international law.

Now, Mr. President, what did they do at the Paris peace conference? They proceeded to adopt Part XIII, and Part XIII does provide for this very conference to which I have referred. It provides for it in this way: It provides that there shall be four delegates from each of the member States. Two of these delegates are to represent the governments, the ordinary people; one of them is to represent the employer of labor; and one of them is to represent organized labor. The solitary distinction, you will observe, between the recommendation of the Berne convention and what was done is this, that the Berne convention demanded that 50 per cent of the representatives should be selected by labor. The authors of this labor provision gave them 25 per cent and gave the employer 25 per cent. But the principle is fully admitted. They did set up the tribunal. They did not give to labor exactly the votes that labor demanded.

But let us see how that happened, why it was accepted. I read from the June number of Current History:

Some difference of opinion made itself felt on the commission as to the relative numbers of the delegates representing the governments, the employers, and the workpeople, respectively. The French, American, Italian, and Cuban delegations contended that each of these three parties should have equal voting power. They maintained that the working classes would never be satisfied with a representation which left the Government and the employers combined in a majority of three to their one.

In other words, the proposal amounted to giving the States a veto on the proceedings of the conference, which would create so much distrust of it among the workers that its influence would be seriously prejudiced from the start.

The adoption of a proposal to which the majority of the Governments were opposed would not lead to any practical results, as the legislative authorities of the Governments whose delegates were in the minority would in all probability refuse to accept it.

This was the argument that prevailed.

Moreover, it was likely—especially in the future—that the Government delegates would vote more often with the workers than against them. If this were so, it was obviously to the advantage of the latter that the Governments should have two votes instead of one, as it would render it easier for them to obtain a two-thirds majority, which, under the Franco-American proposal, would be practically impossible if the employers voted in a body against them.

The commission finally decided by a narrow majority to maintain the proposal that each Government should have two delegates.

In a word, Mr. President, abandoning reading, all the records show that after a considerable dispute there as to whether labor should have 50 per cent of the votes and the Governments 50 per cent of the votes, they reached this compromise, and labor accepted it; or the representatives, not of labor, but the international socialists accepted it, because the international socialists became convinced that they could control the Government vote. Of course, in that conclusion they were perfectly correct, for if you give to one class of the people the right to select 25 per cent of the voting strength in a body, and to do that directly, and then you give to that same class the right, as citizens of a State, to participate with all the other citizens of the State in selecting the representatives of the Government, it is almost inevitable that in the end they will control the selection of the Government delegates.

In a word, it is the principle of Bolshevism once more introduced. Here is a country with 110,000,000 people. I understand that about 4,000,000 are organized. That 4,000,000, or one twenty-fifth of the people of the United States, are given one-fourth of the representation directly in this great tribunal that is to write international law and control the destiny of the world. Then they have the right to throw their power into the general elections and into the selection of the Government, and to control, as far as they are able, the selection of the other two men who are to be sent there to represent all the people.

The man who belongs to one of these organizations first is given twenty-five times the power in the selection of this tribunal that the average man is, and all the rest of the people may not be organized, but are just simply ordinary people, and go along with no other representation than that which is accorded to the organized man as a citizen of the State, and then that organized man is given directly twenty-five times the representation outside. It is the introduction into our system of the proposition that a class shall rule, that the organized worker shall have a vote separate and distinct because he is an organized worker. That vote may be the controlling vote that governs the destiny of the United States or of the world.

To proceed with this a little further, Mr. President, I have read you that the Berne convention demanded the right for these bodies that were to be created, as they demanded they should be created, one half the representatives of labor and the other half the representatives of all the rest of the people, including labor, labor being thus twice represented; I have read you how that convention demanded that the decrees of this body should constitute international law. Let us see what was done about that by the men who prepared the peace treaty.

I read now from the July number of Current History, page 15. The writer discusses the representation of labor.

Demand of the German delegates.

I think it is worth while reading all this. It says:

The note of Count Brockdorff-Rantzau, of May 22, is as follows.

You will notice that this German followed exactly the recommendations of the Berne convention and spoke for Germany. Again I say, and I say it with a vehemence that I wish could reach every part of this country, that I want to hear no more of this talk that those who oppose this treaty are playing into the hands of Germany, when every German of prominence in the world has declared for it; when this German, from whose utterances I am about to read, representing Germany, stands as the special sponsor for Part XIII, only complaining that it does not go far enough. This is his note addressed to M. Clemenceau:

Sir: In the name of the German delegation I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your reply note, dated May 14, 1919, which has been given us on our note concerning international labor legislation.

The German delegation takes note of the fact that the allied and associated Governments are of one mind with the German democratic Government in believing domestic peace and the advancement of humanity to be dependent on the solution of labor questions. The German delegation, however, does not agree with the allied and associated Governments as to the ways and means of arriving at the solution.

Let us go back and note something.

The German delegation takes note of the fact that the allied and associated Governments are of one mind with the German democratic Government in believing domestic peace and the advancement of humanity to be dependent on the solution of labor questions.

That may be true elsewhere, but it is not true here. We may have some strikes and we may have some difficulties here. Strikes and difficulties and wrangles are sometimes not altogether unhealthy. I can say to the international socialists of other countries that the United States of America can take care of its labor problems, and will take care of them, and that we have no fear of the result. We can maintain peace in the United States and will. If the peace were seriously imperiled in our country, the very men who belong to these labor unions would flock to the standard of the Republic. There would be some foreign internationalists who would not. There would be some scoundrels here from abroad who would not. There would be some anarchists who would not. But when we get through with those gentlemen, if they start a sedition, there will not be any necessity to put any guards over them when they are shipped back to their own countries, if they are sent there for internment.

But I want to read this statement. I am cutting it up by my own comments, which I ought not to do. I shall ask permission to have the article printed in full at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NOTE ON INTERNATIONAL LABOR.

The exchange of notes between the peace conference and the German delegation regarding international labor legislation, as made public, consisted of the English text of a note dated May 22, from Count Brockdorff-Rantzau to President Clemenceau, and the allied reply from President Clemenceau, dated May 31.

The note of Count Brockdorff-Rantzau of May 22 follows:

"SIR: In the name of the German delegation I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your reply note, dated May 14, 1919, which has been given us on our note concerning international labor legislation.

"The German delegation takes note of the fact that the allied and associated Governments are of one mind with the German democratic Government in believing domestic peace and the advancement of humanity to be dependent on the solution of labor questions. The German delegation, however, does not agree with the allied and associated Governments as to the ways and means of arriving at the solution.

"In order to avoid misunderstandings and false impressions the German delegation deems it to be necessary to elucidate the fundamental conditions precedent underlying their note of May 10, 1919.

"In the opinion of the German democratic Government the final decision in questions of labor law and labor protection belongs to the workers themselves. It was the intention of the German delegation to give occasion, even while the negotiations of peace are proceeding, to the legitimate representatives of the working people of all countries of casting their vote on this point and bringing into conformity the draft of the conditions of peace the proposal of the German democratic Government and the resolutions of the International Trade Union Conference held at Berne from February 5 to February 9, 1919. Contrary to this proposal the allied and associated Governments do not think it necessary to call a labor conference at Versailles for this purpose.

"The International Labor Conference contemplated to be held at Washington, D. C., to which you refer in your reply note of May 14, 1919, can not replace the conference demanded by us, because it is to be held on the principles which are established by the draft of the treaty of peace for the organization of labor. The latter, however, disregards the demands raised by the International Trade Union Conference in Berne in two material directions. The first divergence is in respect to the representation of the workers. According to the proposal of the International Labor Conference at Berne one-half of the members of the conference entitled to vote must consist of legal representatives of the workers of each country who are organized in trade-unions. The German delegation has indorsed this proposal by transmitting the protocol of the International Trade Union Conference at Berne.

"REPRESENTATION OF LABOR.

"Contrary to this, the draft of the treaty of peace grants to the workers only one-quarter of the total votes at the international conference, for according to the draft of the allied and associated Governments each country is to be represented by two Government delegates, one employer and only one worker. The Governments are even in a position, according to article 390 of the draft of the treaty of peace, to exclude the workers' vote by nominating an employer, and thus giving to Government bureaucrats the casting vote as against the representatives of practical life. This system is at variance with the democratic principles which to the present day have been upheld and fought for in common by the whole international work people, and will deepen the impression held among the workers that they are, as before, furthermore to be the object of legislation governed by the interest of private capital.

"The second divergence refers to the legally binding force of the resolutions of the conference. According to the resolutions of the International Trade Union Conference at Berne, the International Parliament of Labor is to issue not only international conventions, without legally binding force, but also international laws which, from the moment of their adoption, are to have the same effect (legally binding force) as national laws (proclamations to the workers of all countries, adopted by the International Trade Union Conference at Berne, 1919, at the motion of Jousaux, the delegate from France). The draft of the German democratic government indorses this resolution, and makes the passing of such laws depend on the assent of four-fifths of the nations represented. No such resolution can be passed by a conference which is called on the basis of part 13 of the draft of the treaty, but only recommendations or drafts which the Governments concerned may adopt or repudiate, and for such nonobligatory proposals a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast is even required.

"ESSENTIAL TO SOCIAL PEACE.

"In so providing the draft of the conditions of peace deviates to such an extent from the resolutions of the International Trade Union Conference at Bernt, that a discussion and decision by the organizations of labor, as part of the peace negotiations, is absolutely imperative. This would at the same time be in accordance with the demand raised by the International Trade Union Conference at Berne, that the minimum claims of labor agreed upon be, already at the conclusion of peace, turned into international law by the society of nations. Moreover, a firm foundation for the peace of the world shall be erected by this means, whereas a treaty concluded by the governments alone, without the assent of the organized workers of all countries will never bring forth social peace to the world.

"The allied and associated governments give no place to these considerations in their reply. As have above been illustrated, the resolutions of the International Trade Union Conference at Berne are in fact not taken into consideration by part 13 of the draft of the treaty of peace, so that the fears expressed by the German Democratic Government with regard to social justice are in reality not taken into account. This fact must be noted. If we are apprised by the reply note that the representatives of the trade-unions of the countries represented by the allied and associated governments have taken part in the elaboration of the clauses of the conditions of peace relating to labor, we must, on the other hand, make note of the fact that they have made no announcement of any kind notifying a change of their view on the resolutions of the International Trade Union Conference at Berne, much less of an abandonment of these resolutions which they sacredly have adopted.

"The German delegation again moves to call a conference of representatives of the national organizations of all trade-unions before the negotiations of peace are terminated. Should this motion again be rejected, an utterance of the leaders of the trade-unions of all countries is at least necessary. In moving this we desire to bring about that the provisions of the treaty of peace relating to labor may also have the approval of all trade-union organizations.

"Accept, sir, etc."

TEXT OF ALLIED REPLY.

The following is the allied reply, dated May 31, signed by President Clemenceau, to the Brockdorff-Rantzau note of May 22 regarding international labor legislation:

"The president of the peace conference to Count Brockdorff-Rantzau.

PARIS, May 31, 1919.

"SIR: In the name of the allied and associated governments I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your further note dated May 22, 1919, on the subject of international labor legislation. (Conditions of Peace, pt. 13.) The reply is as follows:

"1. The German delegation states the principle for the German National Government, that to the wage earners belongs the final decision in questions of labor law. The allied institutions hold it to be their duty to collaborate with labor in the formulation of such law, but the laws must be passed by representatives of the whole community.

"2. The allied and associated governments draw attention to a misconception in the note to the German Government on May 22, 1919, namely, that the views and interests of Governments must necessarily be antagonistic to those of labor. Accredited labor representatives now form some part of the genuine democratic governments of the world, and the assumed antagonism is not likely to be found anywhere save in the case of governments which are democratic only in name.

"3. The allied and associated Governments fail to find in your letter any useful guidance as to how the principles involved could in any case find definite expression in the peace treaty. The labor organization, which was submitted to representatives of labor, can deal in a practical manner in any proposal put forward by any one of the affiliated members. It is not correct to say that the demands raised by the International Trade Union Congress at Berne are disregarded, inasmuch as the points raised in these resolutions, as well as all other relevant considerations, were discussed and carefully considered, and for the most part are embodied in the preamble of part 13 or in the general principles which are accepted to guide the league of nations and the labor organization in the attainment of social justice. There is manifestly no need for another conference to repeat those resolutions or to cause unnecessary confusion or delay by adding to or departing from them. The widest publicity has been given to the plan of labor organization and the responsible trades-union leaders have been given an ample opportunity to formulate definite suggestions.

"4. The allied and associated Governments have already decided to accept the idea of early admission of German representatives and to ask the Washington conference to admit them immediately thereafter to full membership and rights in respect to the industrial labor organization and the government body attached thereto.

"5. While the resolutions passed by the Berne conference, February, 1919, gave expression to the wishes of the workers and defined their aspirations for the future, the Washington conference provides the means of giving effect to such of these aspirations as can be embodied in legislation without delay, and the labor organization will give opportunities for progressive expression to others, in accordance with the guiding principles already mentioned. The labor commission, moreover, set up by the peace conference envisaged all the points mentioned in your letter as coming within the scope of the labor organization, including an international code of law for the protection of seamen, to be especially drawn up with the collaboration of the seamen's union (copy annexed).

"6. It also adopted a resolution (copy annexed) in favor of the organization being given power as soon as possible to pass resolutions possessing the force of international law. International labor laws can not at present be made operative merely by resolutions passed at conferences. The workers of one country are not prepared to be bound in all matters by laws imposed on them by representatives of other countries; international conventions as provided for under the peace treaty are therefore at present more effective than international labor laws, for the infringement of which no penal sanctions can be applied.

"MORE LIBERAL REPRESENTATION.

"7. In reply to the statement as to the divergence from democratic principles, the proposal of the allied and associated Governments, already pointed out, goes further than that of the German proposition, for three-quarters of the delegates at the labor conference will directly and indirectly represent the wishes of the population generally, the two governmental delegates representing the people at large and the labor delegates representing the workers directly, the employers of labor being granted a representation of only one-quarter. The theory of the German delegation that article 390 of the draft may 'exclude the workers' is wholly fallacious, as the so-called governmental representatives, at least those of the allied and associated powers, would be representatives of the people of those countries. It is to be remembered that in many countries a very large part of the workers are engaged in agriculture and that these workers are not generally united in industrial organizations, and it is therefore peculiarly apparent that their interests should be represented in labor conferences through the governments.

"8. Furthermore, the proposal of the German delegation would permit the prevention of the most beneficent legislation if it was opposed by one-fifth of the Governments represented at the labor conference. It is of particular importance to notice that according to the proposal of the German delegation each country in such a conference would have one vote, and thus the votes of Governments representing perhaps only an insignificant minority of the workers of the world would be able to defeat any proposal whatsoever. In striking contrast with this autocratic idea is the proposal of the allied and associated powers, which not only permits voting in conferences to be by delegates and not by Governments, but also permits a definite proposal to be made by two-thirds of the delegates.

"NEW CONFERENCE UNNECESSARY.

"9. At the present time active preparations are being made for the first meeting of the international labor organization in October. It is obvious, therefore, that no need exists for interposing a labor conference at Versailles. Moreover, the suggestion of the German delegation that the peace negotiations should be delayed in order to permit of another labor conference is contrary to the interests of the workers throughout the world, who are more interested than anyone else in a return to peace as a relief from the conditions produced by four years of German aggression. The allied and associated Governments, taking account of this most just desire, are endeavoring not to postpone but, on the contrary, to hasten the conclusion of peace and to secure the adoption of those measures of social amelioration which would doubtless have been adopted ere this had it not been that the commencement of the war by Germany turned the efforts and thought of the world's population toward a struggle for liberty, during which time other ideals were necessarily subordinated to that of freedom itself.

"CLEMENCEAU.

"Annex 1. The commission considers that the very special questions to be accorded to seamen might be dealt with at a special meeting of the International Labor Conference devoted exclusively to the affairs of seamen.

"Annex 2. The commission expresses the hope that as soon as it may be possible an agreement will be arrived at between the high contracting parties with a view to endowing the International Labor Conference, under the auspices of the league of nations, with power to take, under conditions to be determined, resolutions possessing the force of international law."

Mr. REED. I read from the article:

In order to avoid misunderstandings and false impressions the German delegation deems it to be necessary to elucidate the fundamental conditions precedent underlying their note of May 10, 1919.

In the opinion of the German democratic government the final decision in questions of labor law and labor protection belongs to the workers themselves.

That is a new principle. That is internationalism. That is Bolshevism, that a class of the people are to decide all questions of law concerning themselves for themselves, make their own laws, and enforce them to suit themselves. It continues:

It was the intention of the German delegation to give occasion, even while the negotiations of peace are proceeding, to the legitimate representatives of the working people of all countries of casting their vote on this point and bringing into conformity the draft of the conditions of peace, the proposal of the German democratic government, and the resolutions of the International Trade Union Conference held at Berne from February 5 to February 9, 1919.

I told you this was submitted. I said to you that Part XIII was modeled after the Berne convention. We notice the Germans protesting that it has not been sufficiently modeled. It is said:

Contrary to this proposal, the allied and associated Governments do not think it necessary to call a labor conference at Versailles for this purpose.

The International Labor Conference, contemplated to be held at Washington, D. C., to which you refer in your reply note of May 14, 1919, can not replace the conference demanded by us, because it is to be held on the principles which are established by the draft of the treaty of peace for the organization of labor.

The body referred to is that now meeting here in Washington, and is sitting here by authority of this treaty which the United States has not sanctioned or ratified.

The latter, however, disregards the demands raised by the International Trade Union Conference in Berne in two material directions. The first divergence is in respect to the representation of the workers. According to the proposal of the International Labor Conference at Berne, one-half of the members of the conference entitled to vote must consist of legal representatives of the workers of each country who are organized in trade-unions. The German delegation has indorsed this proposal by transmitting the protocol of the International Trade Union Conference at Berne.

As I said, they did not get all they wanted. They got half of what they wanted.

Contrary to this, the draft of the treaty of peace grants to the workers only one-quarter of the total votes at the international conference, for, according to the draft of the allied and associated Governments, each country is to be represented by two Government delegates, one employer, and only one worker. The Governments are even in a position, according to article 390 of the draft of the treaty of peace, to exclude the workers' vote by nominating an employer, and thus giving to Government bureaucrats the casting vote as against the representatives of practical life. This system is at variance with the democratic principles which to the present day have been upheld and fought for in common by the whole international workpeople, and will deepen the impression held among the workers that they are, as before, furthermore to be the object of legislation governed by the interest of private capital.

So they objected because they only got one vote out of four instead of getting two votes out of four, and that is the point of diversion. The only thing that attention was called to by this German, where they departed from the Berne convention of socialists and anarchists, was this:

The second divergence refers to the legally binding force of the resolutions of the conference. According to the resolutions of the International Trade Union Conference at Berne the international parliament of labor is to issue not only international conventions without legally binding force, but also international laws which, from the moment of their adoption, are to have the same effect—legally binding force—as national laws—proclamations to the workers of all countries, adopted by the International Trade Union Conference at Berne, 1919, at the motion of Jousaux, the delegate from France.

I think that same man is down here now; I am not certain.

The draft of the German democratic government indorses this resolution.

Now, observe the demand that the proceedings of one of these bodies, like the one that is now assembled here in Washington, shall have the force of international law—not be merely advisory, but shall have the force of international law and shall bind every government on earth. Then observe this, that when Mr. Clemenceau replied in his note he stated:

1. The German delegation states the principle for the German National Government that to the wage earners belongs the final decision in questions of labor law. The allied institutions hold it to be their duty to collaborate with labor in the formulation of such law. But the laws must be passed by representatives of the whole community.

Hold that in your mind a moment, for that is not all of it. I read from paragraph 5. Mr. Clemenceau continues:

5. While the resolutions passed by the Berne conference February, 1919, gave expression to the wishes of the workers and defined their aspirations for the future, the Washington conference provides the means of giving effect to such of these aspirations as can be embodied in legislation without delay, and the labor organization will give opportunities for progressive expression to others, in accordance with the guiding principles already mentioned. The labor commission, moreover, set up by the peace conference envisaged all the points mentioned in your letter as coming within the scope of the labor organization, including an international code of law for the protection of the seamen, to be especially drawn up with the collaboration of the seamen's union.

Now note this:

It also adopted a resolution (copy annexed) in favor of the organization being given power as soon as possible to pass resolutions possessing the force of international law.

The very gentlemen who prepared Part XIII wrote back to the Germans and told them that they can not give these labor bodies the power to write international law to-day, but that they favor it and they are going to get it for them.

It adopted a resolution—

I am reading from Clemenceau's letter, and, by the way, Mr. Clemenceau is a socialist, whether he is a hero or not.

It also adopted a resolution (copy annexed) in favor of the organization being given power as soon as possible to pass resolutions possessing the force of international law. International labor laws can not at present be made operative merely by resolutions passed at conferences. The workers of one country are not prepared to be bound in all matters by laws imposed on them by representatives of other countries; international conventions, as provided for under the peace treaty, are therefore at present more effective than international labor laws, for the infringement of which no penal sanctions can be applied.

* * * * * * *

9. At the present time active preparations are being made for the first meeting of the international labor organization in October.

Then Mr. Clemenceau, in relation to the demands for international power to be referred to bodies like they have meeting in Washington, making their decrees international law, states this in Annex 2:

The commission expresses the hope that as soon as it may be possible an agreement will be arrived at between the high contracting parties with a view to endowing the International Labor Conference under the auspices of the league of nations with power to take, under conditions to be determined, resolutions possessing the force of international law.

So that the bald proposition is that a body of men, assembled and constituted as this body of men now meeting, shall have the right, as soon as it can be brought about by the confirmance of Part XIII, to pass their decrees relating to labor in any country and in any clime, and that those decrees when passed shall immediately and without delay become international law, with the same force as national law, governing this world and all of the nations thereof. And you propose to put in a reservation about a thing of that kind! You propose to help set it up in other countries, but to say we will not be bound to participate.

That is the doctrine of the reservationist, but the doctrine of the Democrat or Republican who votes for it is that he is willing to set up a tribunal with those powers, that tribunal not to be selected even by the nations of the world, but to be selected in part by some capital and in part by some labor, and then all of the people, including those two classes, are to have 50 per cent representation; that body, when it meets down here, to represent the entire world, and its decrees to become international law. That, sir, is not socialism; that, sir, is not anarchy. It is something worse than both. It proposes to destroy nationality. It proposes to destroy government. It proposes to set up a government selected, not by the people of the world, but selected by classes of people of the world. And you propose to establish that in this country. At the risk of being called to order again, I say it is a betrayal of the United States; I say it is a betrayal of our duty as Senators; and I say it is wrong to salve one's conscience with the fact that while we wash our hands and say that we will not be a party to it, yet we sanction the setting up of a tribunal by the signing of the treaty that creates this for all of the rest of the world. In my opinion, that is not the part of brave men or of statesmen.

In this connection I call attention to the fact that this is not being done for the benefit of American labor, and I shall a little later try to call the attention of American labor to the fact that this is a move as severe against them as it is against all other parts of the people.

Here is what Mr. Gompers said, and I am reading now from the proceedings of the Atlantic City convention held on June 20. Mr. Gompers made some remarks there, and among other things he said:

Let me say this to you, ladies and gentlemen: It wasn't for the promotion of the interests of American workers that this draft convention received my support. I declared in the commission time and again that, so far as we in the United States were concerned, we could and would take care of ourselves, and I would prefer, with the old text, before the protocol and many other changes were adopted, to take my chances in labor legislation by the activities of the American Federation of Labor, rather than by that draft convention. But I see in this draft convention for labor, not that it will bring very much of light into the lives of American workers, but I do believe that its adoption and operation will have the effect of bringing light into the lives of the workers in the more backward countries.

What concerned me most was that there should not be in the draft convention anything by which the standards of American labor could be reduced, and that the seamen's act should be protected by that protocol to article 19 of the draft convention.

So he was satisfied when he got in the clause that said there should be no legislation that would take away any of the rights labor now has. Of course, that did not accomplish anything; it does not cover the case. But I have this to say to American labor—and, I repeat, I have always occupied a friendly attitude toward it—that when American labor comes to understand the truth it will know that if ever Part XIII is put into effect and becomes a practical working thing, every single principle which American labor has contended for in order to maintain its supremacy and its advantage will be wiped out.

What are those principles? One of those principles is that American laborers should be protected against great influxes of bodies of foreign workmen to take their places. This document deprives the Government of the United States of the right to exclude foreigners from our shores except for limited periods and under peculiar conditions; and we must submit those conditions to the labor conference. Ratify this treaty, and I say to the American laboring man that there can be gathered together all the hordes of Europe and they can be brought over here to take the places of American workers; and they will come and they will take their places.

Then it is made the solemn duty of the lawmaking authorities to see that when they do come they get as good wages, if they demand them, as have been fixed by labor unions. But suppose they do not demand them; suppose they want the labor-union man's place. They can get as much as he can get by the demand, but they can cut his wages and they can take his job; they can leave him to starve; they can come here by the millions; and our Government under this instrument is to be powerless as against the demands of the Berne convention to protect its own shores, a right accorded to it by international law. That is the scheme; that is the plan.

A very great part of American labor has for many years contended that it must be protected against the goods manufactured in other countries by cheap pauper labor. So it has demanded a discriminatory tariff. Many men have contended that that was not necessary, because of natural conditions; but to all those men who adhere to that philosophy I say that the principles of the Berne convention, now about to be enacted into a treaty which binds the world, cover all that and wipe that all out and put the labor of every other country upon an exact equality with American labor.

Let us see what we are doing. What are the real things that kept up the high standard of American labor? Many factors, of course, are involved. One of them is the intelligence of the American workingman; but the chief reason, in my opinion, at

"ESSENTIAL TO SOCIAL PEACE.

"In so providing the draft of the conditions of peace deviates to such an extent from the resolutions of the International Trade Union Conference at Berne, that a discussion and decision by the organizations of labor, as part of the peace negotiations, is absolutely imperative. This would at the same time be in accordance with the demand raised by the International Trade Union Conference at Berne, that the minimum claims of labor agreed upon be, already at the conclusion of peace, turned into international law by the society of nations. Moreover, a firm foundation for the peace of the world shall be erected by this means, whereas a treaty concluded by the governments alone, without the assent of the organized workers of all countries will never bring forth social peace to the world.

"The allied and associated governments give no place to these considerations in their reply. As have above been illustrated, the resolutions of the International Trade Union Conference at Berne are in fact not taken into consideration by part 13 of the draft of the treaty of peace, so that the fears expressed by the German Democratic Government with regard to social justice are in reality not taken into account. This fact must be noted. If we are apprised by the reply note that the representatives of the trade-unions of the countries represented by the allied and associated governments have taken part in the elaboration of the clauses of the conditions of peace relating to labor, we must, on the other hand, make note of the fact that they have made no announcement of any kind notifying a change of their view on the resolutions of the International Trade Union Conference at Berne, much less of an abandonment of these resolutions which they sacredly have adopted.

"The German delegation again moves to call a conference of representatives of the national organizations of all trade-unions before the negotiations of peace are terminated. Should this motion again be rejected, an utterance of the leaders of the trade-unions of all countries is at least necessary. In moving this we desire to bring about that the provisions of the treaty of peace relating to labor may also have the approval of all trade-union organizations.

"Accept, sir, etc."

TEXT OF ALLIED REPLY.

The following is the allied reply, dated May 31, signed by President Clemenceau, to the Brockdorff-Rantzau note of May 22 regarding international labor legislation:

"The president of the peace conference to Count Brockdorff-Rantzau.

PARIS, May 31, 1919.

"SIR: In the name of the allied and associated governments I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your further note dated May 22, 1919, on the subject of international labor legislation. (Conditions of Peace, pt. 13.) The reply is as follows:

"1. The German delegation states the principle for the German National Government, that to the wage earners belongs the final decision in questions of labor law. The allied institutions hold it to be their duty to collaborate with labor in the formulation of such law, but the laws must be passed by representatives of the whole community.

"2. The allied and associated governments draw attention to a misconception in the note to the German Government on May 22, 1919, namely, that the views and interests of Governments must necessarily be antagonistic to those of labor. Accredited labor representatives now form some part of the genuine democratic governments of the world, and the assumed antagonism is not likely to be found anywhere save in the case of governments which are democratic only in name.

"3. The allied and associated Governments fail to find in your letter any useful guidance as to how the principles involved could in any case find definite expression in the peace treaty. The labor organization, which was submitted to representatives of labor, can deal in a practical manner in any proposal put forward by any one of the affiliated members. It is not correct to say that the demands raised by the International Trade Union Congress at Berne are disregarded, inasmuch as the points raised in these resolutions, as well as all other relevant considerations, were discussed and carefully considered, and for the most part are embodied in the preamble of part 13 or in the general principles which are accepted to guide the league of nations and the labor organization in the attainment of social justice. There is manifestly no need for another conference to repeat those resolutions or to cause unnecessary confusion or delay by adding to or departing from them. The widest publicity has been given to the plan of labor organization and the responsible trades-union leaders have been given an ample opportunity to formulate definite suggestions.

"4. The allied and associated Governments have already decided to accept the idea of early admission of German representatives and to ask the Washington conference to admit them immediately thereafter to full membership and rights in respect to the industrial labor organization and the government body attached thereto.

"5. While the resolutions passed by the Berne conference, February, 1919, gave expression to the wishes of the workers and defined their aspirations for the future, the Washington conference provides the means of giving effect to such of these aspirations as can be embodied in legislation without delay, and the labor organization will give opportunities for progressive expression to others, in accordance with the guiding principles already mentioned. The labor commission, moreover, set up by the peace conference envisaged all the points mentioned in your letter as coming within the scope of the labor organization, including an international code of law for the protection of seamen, to be especially drawn up with the collaboration of the seamen's union (copy annexed).

International labor laws can not at present be made operative merely by resolutions passed at conferences. The workers of one country are not prepared to be bound in all matters by laws imposed on them by representatives of other countries; international conventions as provided for under the peace treaty are therefore at present more effective than international labor laws, for the infringement of which no penal sanctions can be applied.

The commission expresses the hope that as soon as it may be possible an agreement will be arrived at between the high contracting parties with a view to endowing the International Labor Conference, under the auspices of the league of nations, with power to take, under conditions to be determined, resolutions possessing the force of international law."

Mr. REED. I read from the article:

In order to avoid misunderstandings and false impressions the German delegation deems it to be necessary to elucidate the fundamental conditions precedent underlying their note of May 10, 1919.

In the opinion of the German democratic government the final decision in questions of labor law and labor protection belongs to the workers themselves.

That is a new principle. That is internationalism. That is Bolshevism, that a class of the people are to decide all questions of law concerning themselves for themselves, make their own laws, and enforce them to suit themselves. It continues:

It was the intention of the German delegation to give occasion, even while the negotiations of peace are proceeding, to the legitimate representatives of the working people of all countries of casting their vote on this point and bringing into conformity the draft of the conditions of peace, the proposal of the German democratic government, and the resolutions of the International Trade Union Conference held at Berne from February 5 to February 9, 1919.

I told you this was submitted. I said to you that Part XIII was modeled after the Berne convention. We notice the Germans protesting that it has not been sufficiently modeled. It is said:

Contrary to this proposal, the allied and associated Governments do not think it necessary to call a labor conference at Versailles for this purpose.

The International Labor Conference, contemplated to be held at Washington, D. C., to which you refer in your reply note of May 14, 1919, can not replace the conference demanded by us, because it is to be held on the principles which are established by the draft of the treaty of peace for the organization of labor.

The body referred to is that now meeting here in Washington, and is sitting here by authority of this treaty which the United States has not sanctioned or ratified.

The latter, however, disregards the demands raised by the International Trade Union Conference in Berne in two material directions. The first divergence is in respect to the representation of the workers. According to the proposal of the International Labor Conference at Berne, one-half of the members of the conference entitled to vote must consist of legal representatives of the workers of each country who are organized in trade-unions. The German delegation has indorsed this proposal by transmitting the protocol of the International Trade Union Conference at Berne.

As I said, they did not get all they wanted. They got half of what they wanted.

Contrary to this, the draft of the treaty of peace grants to the workers only one-quarter of the total votes at the international conference, for, according to the draft of the allied and associated Governments, each country is to be represented by two Government delegates, one employer, and only one worker. The Governments are even in a position, according to article 390 of the draft of the treaty of peace, to exclude the workers' vote by nominating an employer, and thus giving to Government bureaucrats the casting vote as against the representatives of practical life. This system is at variance with the democratic principles which to the present day have been upheld and fought for in common by the whole international workpeople, and will deepen the impression held among the workers that they are, as before, furthermore to be the object of legislation governed by the interest of private capital.

So they objected because they only got one vote out of four instead of getting two votes out of four, and that is the point of diversion. The only thing that attention was called to by this German, where they departed from the Berne convention of socialists and anarchists, was this:

The second divergence refers to the legally binding force of the resolutions of the conference. According to the resolutions of the International Trade Union Conference at Berne the international parliament of labor is to issue not only international conventions without legally binding force, but also international laws which, from the moment of their adoption, are to have the same effect—legally binding force—as national laws—proclamations to the workers of all countries, adopted by the International Trade Union Conference at Berne, 1919, at the motion of Jousaux, the delegate from France.

I think that same man is down here now; I am not certain.

The draft of the German democratic government indorses this resolution.

Now, observe the demand that the proceedings of one of these bodies, like the one that is now assembled here in Washington, shall have the force of international law—not be merely advisory, but shall have the force of international law and shall bind every government on earth. Then observe this, that when Mr. Clemenceau replied in his note he stated:

1. The German delegation states the principle for the German National Government that to the wage earners belongs the final decision in questions of labor law. The allied institutions hold it to be their duty to collaborate with labor in the formulation of such law. But the laws must be passed by representatives of the whole community.

Hold that in your mind a moment, for that is not all of it. I read from paragraph 5. Mr. Clemenceau continues:

5. While the resolutions passed by the Berne conference February, 1919, gave expression to the wishes of the workers and defined their aspirations for the future, the Washington conference provides the means of giving effect to such of these aspirations as can be embodied in legislation without delay, and the labor organization will give opportunities for progressive expression to others, in accordance with the guiding principles already mentioned. The labor commission, moreover, set up by the peace conference envisaged all the points mentioned in your letter as coming within the scope of the labor organization, including an international code of law for the protection of the seamen, to be especially drawn up with the collaboration of the seamen's union.

Now note this:

It also adopted a resolution (copy annexed) in favor of the organization being given power as soon as possible to pass resolutions possessing the force of international law.

The very gentlemen who prepared Part XIII wrote back to the Germans and told them that they can not give these labor bodies the power to write international law to-day, but that they favor it and they are going to get it for them.

It adopted a resolution—

I am reading from Clemenceau's letter, and, by the way, Mr. Clemenceau is a socialist, whether he is a hero or not.

It also adopted a resolution (copy annexed) in favor of the organization being given power as soon as possible to pass resolutions possessing the force of international law. International labor laws can not at present be made operative merely by resolutions passed at conferences. The workers of one country are not prepared to be bound in all matters by laws imposed on them by representatives of other countries; international conventions, as provided for under the peace treaty, are therefore at present more effective than international labor laws, for the infringement of which no penal sanctions can be applied.

* * * * * * *

9. At the present time active preparations are being made for the first meeting of the international labor organization in October.

Then Mr. Clemenceau, in relation to the demands for international power to be referred to bodies like they have meeting in Washington, making their decrees international law, states this in Annex 2:

The commission expresses the hope that as soon as it may be possible an agreement will be arrived at between the high contracting parties with a view to endowing the International Labor Conference under the auspices of the league of nations with power to take, under conditions to be determined, resolutions possessing the force of international law.

So that the bald proposition is that a body of men, assembled and constituted as this body of men now meeting, shall have the right, as soon as it can be brought about by the confirmance of Part XIII, to pass their decrees relating to labor in any country and in any clime, and that those decrees when passed shall immediately and without delay become international law, with the same force as national law, governing this world and all of the nations thereof. And you propose to put in a reservation about a thing of that kind! You propose to help set it up in other countries, but to say we will not be bound to participate.

That is the doctrine of the reservationist, but the doctrine of the Democrat or Republican who votes for it is that he is willing to set up a tribunal with those powers, that tribunal not to be selected even by the nations of the world, but to be selected in part by some capital and in part by some labor, and then all of the people, including those two classes, are to have 50 per cent representation; that body, when it meets down here, to represent the entire world, and its decrees to become international law. That, sir, is not socialism; that, sir, is not anarchy. It is something worse than both. It proposes to destroy nationality. It proposes to destroy government. It proposes to set up a government selected, not by the people of the world, but selected by classes of people of the world. And you propose to establish that in this country. At the risk of being called to order again, I say it is a betrayal of the United States; I say it is a betrayal of our duty as Senators; and I say it is wrong to salve one's conscience with the fact that while we wash our hands and say that we will not be a party to it, yet we sanction the setting up of a tribunal by the signing of the treaty that creates this for all of the rest of the world. In my opinion, that is not the part of brave men or of statesmen.

In this connection I call attention to the fact that this is not being done for the benefit of American labor, and I shall a little later try to call the attention of American labor to the fact that this is a move as severe against them as it is against all other parts of the people.

Here is what Mr. Gompers said, and I am reading now from the proceedings of the Atlantic City convention held on June 20. Mr. Gompers made some remarks there, and among other things he said:

Let me say this to you, ladies and gentlemen: It wasn't for the promotion of the interests of American workers that this draft convention received my support. I declared in the commission time and again that, so far as we in the United States were concerned, we could and would take care of ourselves, and I would prefer, with the old text, before the protocol and many other changes were adopted, to take my chances in labor legislation by the activities of the American Federation of Labor, rather than by that draft convention. But I see in this draft convention for labor, not that it will bring very much of light into the lives of American workers, but I do believe that its adoption and operation will have the effect of bringing light into the lives of the workers in the more backward countries.

What concerned me most was that there should not be in the draft convention anything by which the standards of American labor could be reduced, and that the seamen's act should be protected by that protocol to article 19 of the draft convention.

So he was satisfied when he got in the clause that said there should be no legislation that would take away any of the rights labor now has. Of course, that did not accomplish anything; it does not cover the case. But I have this to say to American labor—and, I repeat, I have always occupied a friendly attitude toward it—that when American labor comes to understand the truth it will know that if ever Part XIII is put into effect and becomes a practical working thing, every single principle which American labor has contended for in order to maintain its supremacy and its advantage will be wiped out.

What are those principles? One of those principles is that American laborers should be protected against great influxes of bodies of foreign workmen to take their places. This document deprives the Government of the United States of the right to exclude foreigners from our shores except for limited periods and under peculiar conditions; and we must submit those conditions to the labor conference. Ratify this treaty, and I say to the American laboring man that there can be gathered together all the hordes of Europe and they can be brought over here to take the places of American workers; and they will come and they will take their places.

Then it is made the solemn duty of the lawmaking authorities to see that when they do come they get as good wages, if they demand them, as have been fixed by labor unions. But suppose they do not demand them; suppose they want the labor-union man's place. They can get as much as he can get by the demand, but they can cut his wages and they can take his job; they can leave him to starve; they can come here by the millions; and our Government under this instrument is to be powerless as against the demands of the Berne convention to protect its own shores, a right accorded to it by international law. That is the scheme; that is the plan.

A very great part of American labor has for many years contended that it must be protected against the goods manufactured in other countries by cheap pauper labor. So it has demanded a discriminatory tariff. Many men have contended that that was not necessary, because of natural conditions; but to all those men who adhere to that philosophy I say that the principles of the Berne convention, now about to be enacted into a treaty which binds the world, cover all that and wipe that all out and put the labor of every other country upon an exact equality with American labor.

Let us see what we are doing. What are the real things that kept up the high standard of American labor? Many factors, of course, are involved. One of them is the intelligence of the American workingman; but the chief reason, in my opinion, at least, is found in the fact that there are in this country immense material advantages which the Old World does not possess.

Here are our undeveloped resources; here is a constantly expanding world. Commerce is growing; buildings are being erected; cities are growing up in a night. The wilderness is being conquered; swamps are being reclaimed; there is a constant demand for labor. Because of that demand the American workingman has always had a position of superior advantage, but if this scheme goes through the labor of the world is to be reduced to a dead level. That is the principle. They may tell American labor that they propose to raise the wages of all the other workers of the world up to the American level, but even if that were possible we should still be on the same level; and when you are on the same level with another man you have no advantage.

But the fact is that that dream can not be realized; the fact is that the man who tries to put the American workman upon the same level as the serf of Russia, the peon of Mexico, the Chinese coolie, or the Jap is helping to murder American labor; whether it is done under the sanction of the league of nations or however done, it destroys the supremacy of the American laborer and takes away his advantage. We are asked to sacrifice him upon the altar of international socialism, not for his benefit, Mr. Gompers tells us, but for the benefit of somebody thousands and thousands of miles away. Why should he be placed upon that altar? Why should he be so immolated and sacrificed? If, unfortunately, a race of men somewhere else have submitted through the long ages to conditions of climate and soil and government and to economic conditions under which they have seen fit to live, why should the American laborer, whose ancestors or who himself sought our shores to better his condition, who is the beneficiary of a long line of ancestors who have slowly climbed the ladder of success—why should that man sacrifice himself for the benefit of the Chinaman or the Jap or the man of India or the man of Siam or the inhabitants of other even less favored parts of the world? Why should the American laboring men who bared their bosoms to the blasts of this war as bravely and patriotically as any other class of people, who stood in the trenches as inflexibly, who endured the toils of the march and the horror of the hospital with the same courage as the rest of those who fought to preserve our flag, be now sacrified for the benefit of men thousands of miles away, men who from environment and training can live on one-quarter or one-tenth of what the American laborer can live upon, men who have no ambition in life and who are satisfied to tread in the mills of the centuries and to become mere automatons, working and toiling in their own dull way with their own dull brains and their own dull hands from the cradle to the grave? Why should American labor be thus sacrificed? I say to you, sir, it will not submit to being so sacrificed. The American laborer is not an international socialist yet. There is more of international socialism about to be recognized here in Washington than exists in the other parts of our country.

Mr. President, there is one phase of this treaty to which I wish to invite particular attention. I shall not go over the plan of organization of the labor government of the world which is to be set up further than to refer in the briefest way to the outlines of the structure, and then I wish to call attention to one or two monstrous provisions.

There is to be a general conference created, composed of four representatives from each of the members of the league. That will give a body of 128 men, 64 of whom are to represent the Governments, 32 to represent the employers of labor, whoever they may be, and 32 to represent union or organized labor. Each of them is to be entitled in a meeting to have two advisers on each item of the agenda or program to be considered at that meeting. If there were 20 items of the agenda, each man could have 40 advisers. So we might well have a body of 7,000 or 8,000 men assembled at any time, and thus all the walking delegates of the country could have their way paid by the Government. Out of this body thus constituted there is created what is known as the governing body, composed of 24 men, 12 of them representing States, 6 of them representing the employers of labor, and 6 of them representing organized labor.

It will be observed, in the first place, that there are 32 States represented at the present time in the league of nations, and if there are only 12 representatives of government upon the governing body, then there must be 20 of these States without any representation at all. While there are 20 States left without representation, the labor organizations of the world might or they might not be represented.

The bodies thus constituted have the authority to submit to the various Governments of the world drafts of international conventions. They are to prepare the conventions or treaties for the sovereign Governments of the world, and, when so prepared, it is made the legal duty of the Governments to submit those conventions or treaties within 12 months, and at the longest 18 months, to their appropriate bodies for ratification.

Mr. President, it is true that the Governments are not forced to enter into these treaties, and if they do not enter into them, they are not bound; but, sir, that is no answer to be made. If we are engaged in setting up this tribunal, we must be setting it up for a purpose. That purpose must be to carry out the scheme and plan. We help to create a scheme and plan. It must be our purpose to do one of two things—to comply with that scheme and plan in good faith and help carry it out, or else it is our purpose to deceive the world and our associates when we enter into it, because we enter into it without the intention honestly to carry it out.

I can not attribute that base motive or purpose to the United States. Therefore, I say that if we enter this tribunal of the league of nations, with the tribunal that is proposed in Part XIII, we are in good faith bound to accept the recommendations that are made. Any other argument is the argument that we are not acting in good faith. Any other claim is the claim that we are setting up something here as a fraud upon the world.

Moreover, if we do not carry out these recommendations, we give to ourselves the lie direct, for we have recited in the league of nations covenant itself that it is necessary to carry out these conditions in order to maintain the peace of the world, and we have solemnly asseverated that we propose in good faith to promote that peace, and we have recited in the preamble to article 13 this:

Whereas conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship, and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled; and an improvement of those conditions is urgently required, as, for example, by the regulation of the hours of work, including the establishment of a maximum working day and week, the regulation of the labour supply, the prevention of unemployment, the provision of an adequate living wage, the protection of the worker against sickness, disease, and injury arising out of his employment, the protection of children, young persons, and women, provision for old age and injury, protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own, recognition of the principle of freedom of association, the organisation of vocational and technical education, and other measures;

Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries;

The high contracting parties, moved by sentiments of justice and humanity as well as by the desire to secure the permanent peace of the world, agree to the following:

So we affirm that you can not have peace in the world unless these things are done. We affirm that unless Part XIII is accepted and its terms carried out the peace of the world can not be maintained. In the treaty itself, in article 23, is laid down the same proposition, and I am going, with the permission of the Senate, to print that as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARTICLE 23.

Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the members of the league:

(a) will endeavour to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labour for men, women, and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organisations.

* * * * * * *

Mr. REED. So, now, if we are in good faith, we become bound to go into this scheme and to help carry it out. Therefore, when the draft convention is submitted, it is our duty in order to preserve the peace of the world, in order to make the league of nations a success, in order to realize this dream of a universal peace and equity, that we shall accept that draft convention; and when it is accepted, what is the result? A result so appalling, so unbelievable, that no man in this Chamber would have deemed it possible if it were not here written in cold type.

It is provided, sir, that once we have accepted this condition, any State—aye, any labor organization—can file a complaint with the governing body of 24 men, charging that the United States has not fulfilled its obligations under that convention. That is to say, the charge can be made that the United States has not enforced the eight-hour law in Georgia, sir; that a negro has been caught picking cotton after 5 o'clock in the evening, or that a white man has been caught working over hours, and contrary to the rules of the union.

Thereupon this body of 24 men, 6 of them representing union labor, 6 of them representing employers, 12 of them representing the people of the world, including the laborer and employer, shall determine whether they will put the Government to trial; and let us say it is the United States, and that the high crime and misdemeanor of which we have been guilty is that we have not enforced the eight-hour law, or that we have not provided employment, or that we have not passed an old-age pension law, or done something else that these 24 autocrats of the world have told us we ought to do, and that we have been foolish enough to agree to do. Now, we are brought to trial, sir; and I ask the privilege of printing along with my remarks, without reading it here, the language of the document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ARTICLE 409.

In the event of any representation being made to the international labour office by an industrial association of employers or of workers that any of the members has failed to secure in any respect the effective observance within its jurisdiction of any convention to which it is a party, the governing body may communicate this representation to the Government against which it is made and may invite that Government to make such statement on the subject as it may think fit.

ARTICLE 410

If no statement is received within a reasonable time from the Government in question, or if the statement when received is not deemed to be satisfactory by the governing body, the latter shall have the right to publish the representation and the statement, if any, made in reply to it.

ARTICLE 411.

Any of the members shall have the right to file a complaint with the international labour office if it is not satisfied that any other member is securing the effective observance of any convention which both have ratified in accordance with the foregoing articles.

The governing body may, if it thinks fit, before referring such a complaint to a commission of enquiry, as hereinafter provided for, communicate with the Government in question in the manner described in article 409

If the governing body does not think it necessary to communicate the complaint to the Government in question, or if, when they have made such communication, no statement in reply has been received within a reasonable time which the governing body considers to be satisfactory, the governing body may apply for the appointment of a commission of enquiry to consider the complaint and to report thereon.

The governing body may adopt the same procedure either of its own motion or on receipt of a complaint from a delegate to the conference.

When any matter arising out of articles 410 or 411 is being considered by the governing body of the Government in question shall, if not already represented thereon, be entitled to send a representative to take part in the proceedings of the governing body while the matter is under consideration. Adequate notice of the date on which the matter will be considered shall be given to the Government in question.

ARTICLE 412.

The commission of enquiry shall be constituted in accordance with the following provisions:

Each of the members agrees to nominate within six months of the date on which the present treaty comes into force three persons of industrial experience, of whom one shall be a representative of employers, one a representative of workers, and one a person of independent standing, who shall together form a panel from which the members of the commission of enquiry shall be drawn.

The qualifications of the persons so nominated shall be subject to scrutiny by the governing body, which may by two-thirds of the votes cast by the representatives present refuse to accept the nomination of any person whose qualifications do not in its opinion comply with the requirements of the present article.

Upon the application of the governing body, the secretary-general of the league of nations shall nominate three persons, one from each section of this panel, to constitute the commission of enquiry, and shall designate one of them as the president of the commission. None of these three persons shall be a person nominated to the panel by any member directly concerned in the complaint.

ARTICLE 413.

The members agree that, in the event of the reference of a complaint to a commission of enquiry under article 411, they will each, whether directly concerned in the complaint or not, place at the disposal of the commission all the information in their possession which bears upon the subject matter of the complaint.

ARTICLE 414.

When the commission of enquiry has fully considered the complaint it shall prepare a report embodying its findings on all questions of fact relevant to determining the issue between the parties and containing such recommendations as it may think proper as to the steps which should be taken to meet the complaint and the time within which they shou'd be taken.

It shall also indicate in this report the measures, if any, of an economic character against a defaulting Government which it considers to be appropriate, and which it considers other Governments would be justified in adopting.

ARTICLE 415.

The secretary-general of the league of nations shall communicate the report of the commission of enquiry to each of the Governments concerned in the complaint, and shall cause it to be published.

Each of these Governments shall within one month inform the secretary-general of the league of nations whether or not it accepts the recommendations contained in the report of the commission; and if not, whether it proposes to refer the complaint to the permanent court of international justice of the league of nations.

ARTICLE 416.

In the event of any member failing to take the action required by article 405, with regard to a recommendation or draft convention, any other member shall be entitled to refer the matter to the permanent court of international justice.

ARTICLE 417.

The decision of the permanent court of international justice in regard to a complaint or matter which has been referred to it in pursuance of article 415 or article 416 shall be final.

ARTICLE 418.

The permanent court of international justice may affirm, vary, or reverse any of the findings or recommendations of the commission of enquiry, if any, and shall in its decision indicate the measures, if any, of an economic character which it considers to be appropriate, and which other Governments would be justified in adopting against a defaulting Government.

ARTICLE 419.

In the event of any member failing to carry out within the time specified the recommendations, if any, contained in the report of the commission of enquiry, or in the decision of the permanent court of international justice, as the case may be, any other member may take against that member the measures of an economic character indicated in the report of the commission or in the decision of the court as appropriate to the case.

ARTICLE 420.

The defaulting Government may at any time inform the governing body that it has taken the steps necessary to comply with the recommendations of the commission of enquiry or with those in the decision of the permanent court of international justice, as the case may be, and may request it to apply to the secretary-general of the league to constitute a commission of enquiry to verify its contention. In this case the provisions of articles 412, 413, 414, 415, 417, and 418 shall apply, and if the report of the commission of enquiry or the decision of the permanent court of international justice is in favour of the defaulting Government, the other Governments shall forthwith discontinue the measures of an economic character that they have taken against the defaulting Government.

Mr. REED. How do they proceed? They pick a jury panel of three men from each of the States members of this league. There are 32 members now. That would mean 96 men on the panel. I can picture this panel now. I can see the three colored gentlemen from Liberia, the three from Haiti, coming, wondering whether they have to take their winter clothes along with them. I can see three gentlemen from the deserts of Arabia. They have just laid aside their old-fashioned flint-lock rifles, with which they have been holding up the pious pilgrims to the shrine of Mahomet, and are undertaking to garb themselves in the accouterments of civilization, providing themselves with concealed instead of obvious weapons. As the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] tells me, the King of Hejaz has a subsidy of three-quarters of a million dollars a year from Great Britain, or three-quarters of a million a year during the war. Very well. He is cheap at the price, because he will vote right. I can see them from India, the snake charmer, and the voodooist from Siam, and as you search their baggage you will find the dried-snake fetish that the jurors probably worship. I can behold them picked from every quarter of the world, and I have not time to describe the motley crew; but if they were assembled there probably would not be anybody there, outside of a few educated Englishmen and Frenchmen and Italians, who could understand what anybody else said.

Out of this body of 96 men—Hottentots and buccaneers and pirates and princes—they proceed to draw a jury of 3 men. One of them is to represent labor—not just to represent other folks, but organized labor, a class—one of them is to represent employers, and one to represent governments, I believe—three men, not one to represent the United States, because we are a party in interest and have no representation.

Here stands Uncle Sam, prisoner at the bar, charged with having violated the eight-hour law in Georgia on a farm. They try him like a common criminal, and they find him guilty, and they proceed to fix the punishment, and there is no limit to the punishment. There is no law; there is no constitution; there is nothing except their gracious charity and pity; and they condemn old Uncle Sam, and I can see his majestic figure, his head somewhat bowed in shame, his eyes envisioning the day when he was a sovereign looking the world in the face, when his spirit was that of the eagle, and his soul the soul of liberty. They lead him out, and then, by three men, not an American there, try a sovereign nation before private individuals—that is all it amounts to; before a trio of foreign internationalists—that is all it amounts to; before international socialists—that is all it amounts to; before anarchists who would destroy the structure of civilization and tear down the temple of liberty to-morrow—that is what it amounts to.

Oh, but it is said you can appeal to a court! Yes; some kind of a court yet to be created, the composition of which we do not know. But again the court renders its decree. That decree is binding. There is no appeal. It is not a question of whether we think it just or unjust. There is only the question of obedience.

A decree is rendered by this court, and if we do not obey they have the right to call upon the league of nations to apply such economic pressure as they recommend. What, sir, is economic pressure? The most brutal instrumentality in the civilized world, after all, has been the boycott. We all know where the word came from. It was coined over in Ireland, where the inhabitants refused to speak to or look at the foreign landlord, refused to trade with him, refused to sell him anything. They did that justifiably, for an oppressor was in their land; but it was a terrible weapon. In our civil life it has been a weapon that has resulted in the destruction many times of men's fortunes. But applied internationally we are told what it is in the league of nations. It is the right to command that other nations shall cease to have any intercourse whatever with a nation that is thus boycotted. Its commerce is to be refused, its nationals are to be denied the right to communicate with the nationals of other countries. All financial transactions must cease. Ships shall no longer ply the ocean and carry freight to its ports. It is to be sealed up as in a tomb. It is to suffer a living death. It is to have starvation finally fastened upon it by the most terrible instrument of the fiends of war. It is the thing that is applied by military commanders in time of war as the means by which they can break the morale of the line by starvation in the rear which they can not destroy by attacking in the front. It is a glorious and humane proposition, that proposes to substitute for the death of brave men upon the battle field the starvation of women and of babes at home. This may be visited upon us by the mandate of three foreigners, not one of whom can speak our tongue, and these men not representatives even of Governments but representatives, in part at least, of classes of people.

This monstrous creation, sir, you propose to set up, and to give it sanctity, and all you are going to do is to say, like Pilate, "I wash my hands. Take ye Him and crucify Him," instead of striking it down with the force of a giant's blow, instead of saying to all the world, "America stands acquit; America turns her back against every proposition to break down the structure of society, or to set up Bolshevism or sovietism or anarchism anywhere in the world."

Sir, this is to be accepted undebated, undigested, not understood by the people of our country. Let me tell you what I think of it in a few short sentences. The thing that has made the American race progress has been the equal opportunity of its people before the law. Every other nation that has risen and that has fallen, or that even yet survives, in all the tides of time, has been great just in proportion as it has afforded opportunity to the masses of its people, a chance in life. That chance in life can only exist where it is an equal chance. You can not have a government of an autocracy of wealth unless you retard the growth and development of an entire people. You can not have a government of an autocracy of labor without at the same time retarding the growth and development of the entire country. This is proven to-day in Russia. The salvation of the laboring man consists in his equal opportunity to run the race of life. The thing that makes life sweet and glorious to him is the fact that all men have an equal chance, for he may labor with his hands and he may be an employer to-morrow; he may be a capitalist the day after. When you destroy the chance and opportunity of that man to advance himself, you destroy his opportunity in life.

There is no terror so great in my heart to-day as that something may be done to destroy that equality before the law. Here we are proposing in the United States Senate and in the councils of the world to give to a class of people who happen to be organized together in societies and associations the right to special representation in the government of the world separate and distinct from the government the other people enjoy. We propose here to set up, then, a government by a part of the people, an autocracy of organization as against the mass of the people of the land. Sir, I say that if this thing is done it will be the saddest blow ever struck to labor itself. It will be the saddest blow ever struck to the liberties of our country.

No reservation answers the question, for a reservation still allows this thing to be set up and makes us a party to the organization that will set it up. Though we refuse to be bound, still we have created it. Though we refuse to be parties to the operations of the serpent after it is hatched, we have helped hatch the serpent. Though we say it shall not enter here, we have helped to create a creature that will wind its coils around the liberties of other peoples in other lands, and we have recognized as a world principle the proposition that the world should not be governed by all the people of the world, but that it should be governed by a class of the people.

Sir, signs of the times warn us to beware, when it was shown before a Senate committee recently that men who are anarchistic in their views and destructive in all their sentiments are to-day controlling vast classes of men, and when we find them boasting, "We have now become so powerful that by a strike we shall not only injure our employer and compel him to submit because of his injuries, but we shall compel the American people to force him to submit by starving the American people for want of food or freezing them for want of fuel."

That, sir, is a new proposition in American life. A strike used to be aimed at the employer. It was a contest between him and his men. The object of the strike was to compel him to yield because of the misfortunes put upon him. But to-day these strikes seem to be taking the character of an effort to freeze the people of the United States into submission and to starve them into submission. Beware, as we pass along the troubled highway of these times, that we do not add fuel to a smoldering fire and that we do not by our acts encourage and recognize the very principle that these men contend for. That principle is that a few men, organized, have the right to control the destiny of the rest of the people of the world, the principle written in this document that we are asked now to sanction.

If we strike it out we shall play the part of a manly nation. If we strike it out we shall play the part of Senators of the United States. If we quibble about it, if we evade it, if we refuse to take responsibility we shall play a part of which I shall never be proud and which I think none of you will look back upon with any cheerfulness of mind.

Mr. President, these questions should go to the American people. It is our business to see that they do go to the American people. This revolutionary instrument should be submitted to the votes of that great body of men and women who constitute, after all, the Government of the United States of America.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	McCumber	Sherman
Ball	Gronna	McKel'ar	Simmons
Borah	Hale	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Harding	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Calder	Harris	Moses	Smith, S. C.

France	La Follette	Ransdell	Watson
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Reed	Williams
Gay	Lodge	Robinson	Wolcott
Gerry	McCormick	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 3 o'clock p. m.). Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. In accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement, the amendment known as the La Follette amendment is now to be voted upon. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is necessarily absent. For that reason I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and I must withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I believe the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has not voted. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. Noting that he has not voted, I transfer my pair with him to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and let my vote stand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My colleague, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. GERRY. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are absent on public business.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] are detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—34.

Ball	Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Poindexter
Borah	Gore	McLean	Reed
Calder	Gronna	Moses	Sherman

Brandegee	Martin	Shields	Warren
Dillingham	Penrose	Smith, Md.

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask for the printing of a document?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I have here a compilation of notes exchanged between the German peace delegation and the allied and associated powers, respecting the conditions of peace presented to Germany. They are very important papers, many of which have not been printed, and I think they would make a very valuable public document. I ask that they may be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. [S. Doc. No. 149.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Senate. After having spoken for 1 hour and 40 minutes,

Mr. LODGE. I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin can not conclude to-night.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can not conclude to-night.

EXECUTIVE SESSION WITH CLOSED DOORS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate go into secret executive session.

The motion was agreed to, and the doors were closed. After 10 minutes spent in secret executive session, the doors were reopened.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, November 6, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, November 5, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the center and circumference, the all in all, the Alpha and Omega, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, creating, recreating, upholding, directing the destiny of men and of nations, open Thou our perceptions, that we may see clearly the way, and give us the courage to walk therein, that our lives may harmonize with the great eternal plan, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in earth as in heaven.

We faintly hear, we dimly see,
In differing phrase we pray;
But, dim or clear, we own in Thee,
The Light, the Truth, the Way!

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday, November 3, was read and approved.

REQUEST TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana, Dr. ASWELL, be permitted to address the House for 35 minutes.

The SPEAKER. This being Calendar Wednesday, the Chair thinks that there must be unanimous consent to dispense with the regular business of Calendar Wednesday. The gentleman can put it in that form.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I move that the business of Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with for 35 minutes and that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] be permitted to consume the time for 35 minutes in addressing the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent——

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of order that the Chair can not entertain a motion of that sort on Calendar Wednesday under the rule.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the reason?

Mr. MADDEN. You can not make that kind of a motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is asking unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. That is different.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was putting it as a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood that the gentleman moved it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put it as a request for unanimous consent. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the business of Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with for 35 minutes to allow the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] to address the House for 35 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, a parliamentary inquiry. My impression is that the present Speaker and the former Speaker have both held that a unanimous-consent request can not be submitted on Calendar Wednesday. Is not that true?

The SPEAKER. That is, on the ground that the business of Calendar Wednesday must be dispensed with, but this is a request for unanimous consent to dispense with the business of Calendar Wednesday for that length of time.

Mr. MONDELL. But the rule is that the business of Calendar Wednesday can only be dispensed with by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Unanimous consent is more than two-thirds.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I think it is bad practice to have these speeches coming in on Calendar Wednesday, and therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota objects.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the call rests with the Committee on Military Affairs. They have a few bills of not very great importance, but still bills that ought to be passed. My hope is that these bills may be disposed of in about two hours, and that we may then go to the Unanimous Consent Calendar. If the business of that committee is disposed of at a reasonably early hour this afternoon, I intend to move to suspend the business of Calendar Wednesday for the balance of the day and go to the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 3844) for the relief of Della James, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7751. An act authorizing the sale of inherited and unpartitioned allotments for town-site purposes in the Quapaw Agency, Okla.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 2883. An act authorizing the Meridian Highway Bridge Co., a corporation, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges and approaches thereto across the Missouri River between Yankton County, S. Dak., and Cedar County, Nebr.; and

S. 641. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

October 22, 1919:

H. R. 7478. An act to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918; and

H. R. 8624. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, and to regulate rents in the District of Columbia.

October 27, 1919:

H. R. 7138. An act granting a franking privilege to Edith Carow Roosevelt.

November 4, 1919:

H. R. 9205. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that bills and joint resolutions of the following numbers and titles, having been presented to the President of the United States for his approval, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which they originated within the time prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, have become laws without his approval:

Presented to the President September 29, 1919:

H. R. 9091. An act granting the consent of the Congress to the county of Hennepin, in the State of Minnesota, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Minnesota River.

Presented to the President October 2, 1919:

H. J. Res. 208. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to expend certain sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, and June 30, 1920, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va.

Presented to the President October 7, 1919:

H. R. 7417. An act to amend an act of Congress approved March 12, 1914, authorizing the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

Presented to the President October 16, 1919:

H. R. 7972. An act to improve the administration of the Postal Service in the Territory of Hawaii, in Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands; and

S. J. Res. 112. Joint resolution continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Committee on Military Affairs was called.

JURISDICTION OF CRANEY AND FISHERMANS ISLANDS.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs I call up the bill (S. 2495) transferring the tract of land known as Craney Island from the jurisdiction of the War Department to the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department and transferring the tract of land known as Fishermans Island from the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department to the jurisdiction of the War Department.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, calls up a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from California a question for information. How long will this bill take?

Mr. KAHN. It should not take more than five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have heard that kind of stuff before. What are you going to call up after this? I want to know for my own information.

Mr. KAHN. There is another bill for the transfer of a lighthouse reservation at North Point, Md. There are also about six or seven bills unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, covering various subjects. I am not calling up any bill as to which the action of the committee was not unanimous.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if it is possible to get up the bill for public roads, in which we are very much interested? A bill has passed the Senate and been reported by the Military Affairs Committee, to undertake to transfer to the departments of public roads of the various States, for the building of the public highways, a lot of unused war material. I think it is a matter of very great importance to the State of Virginia, and I have been hoping that the chairman would call up that bill.

Mr. KAHN. I understand that the matter is to be taken up under a special rule to-morrow, but I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. WALSH. The bill has not been read. This is all irregular. Debate can not start until the bill has been read.

The SPEAKER. This is all by unanimous consent. The bill must be read before there is any debate. The clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the military reservation known as Craney Island, now under the control and jurisdiction of the War Department, lying on the western side of the Elizabeth River in Norfolk County, Va., and bounded by the waters of the Elizabeth River, Craney Island Creek, Thoroughfare Creek, and James River, be, and the same hereby is, transferred to and placed under the control and jurisdiction of the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service; and that the sandspit or island called Fishermans Island or Linen Bar, now under the control and jurisdiction of the Treasury Department, situate, lying, and being in the county of Northampton off the point of Cape Charles, between the Atlantic Ocean and Chesapeake Bay, in the eastern district of Virginia, about 12 miles south of Cape Charles City and about 1¼ miles from Cape Charles Light, containing 225 acres, more or less, above high-water mark, be, and the same hereby is, transferred to and placed under the control and jurisdiction of the War Department for use for military purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to get about five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska first.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] with reference to the bill that has been reported out by the Military Affairs Committee concerning the distribution of motor vehicles to the highway departments of the several States, I will say that that legislation, so far as it pertains to motor vehicles, is utterly and absolutely unnecessary. Legislation was passed by this House as a rider on the post office appropriation act in March, which granted authority, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, to turn over to the highway department all of the surplus motor vehicles for the purpose of being operated upon roads which were built in whole or in part by Federal aid. Subsequent to that time, in July, a provision was incorporated in the sundry civil appropriation act to the effect that no further transfers of motor vehicles should be made to any of the departments unless compensation was paid therefor, unless such transfers were otherwise authorized by law. The matter was submitted by the Secretary of War to the Judge Advocate General, who rendered an opinion that the provisions of the July act was a prohibition of further transfers to the Agricultural Department for the purpose of building roads by Federal aid. It was then carried to the Attorney General, and the Attorney General rendered an opinion that it was not a prohibition for the reason that the language in the sundry civil appropriation act of July was to prohibit the transfer to any department, unless the transfer was authorized by law, and in the act of March, the post office appropriation act, we had directly authorized by law the transfer to the Highway Commission. Consequently any legislation before this body now granting authority to the Secretary of War to turn these motor vehicles over to the Highway Department is merely a duplication. That is already the law and has already been construed as being the law by the Attorney General and the department in part has been following it.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. BROWNE. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, notwithstanding the overruling of the Judge Advocate's opinion by the Attorney General, refuses to turn over certain road material such as tractor engines and concrete mixers and a great many other things?

Mr. REAVIS. Oh, the Agriculture Department has been clamoring and the highway departments of the various States have been appealing ever since January of this year for this equipment. There has been full authority of law since March of this year, and all of that time the trucks have been standing in the open with no storage to protect them.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Have they been authorized ever since March to make these transfers without compensation?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes; in the Post Office appropriation act of March.

Mr. KITCHIN. I thought I understood the gentleman to say that subsequently in some other appropriation act passed this session——

Mr. REAVIS. In the sundry civil appropriation act of July, following the appropriation act of March, there was a rider attached to the act to the effect that no further transfers should be made to these departments, without compensation, unless otherwise authorized by law, but it was authorized by law in the act of March to turn them over to the Agriculture Department, and the Attorney General so construed the law, and I do not see how any man could have construed it otherwise.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I think that law was passed February 28, 1919.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman means the first authorization?

Mr. KAHN. The Post Office appropriation act.

Mr. REAVIS. Whether in February or March, there has been full authority for this transfer from February or March down until this time, to the Secretary of War, and the matter will come before the House under a rule to-morrow with reference to compelling the transfer.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I am very much interested in the matter. I do not care how we get it, if we get results. I understand that the resolution which has been reported with a rule is nothing in the world but a House resolution asking the Secretary of War to turn these machines over.

Mr. REAVIS. That is absolutely true, and it is also true that certain food lay in the warehouse rotting for nine months until the same kind of a resolution was passed by this House, and it was then turned out to the people within two weeks.

Mr. HARRISON. The resolution is confined solely to motor vehicles, when there is any quantity of other road material.

Mr. REAVIS. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken about there being any quantity. There is a very limited quantity.

Mr. HARRISON. I think there is $4,500,000 worth.

Mr. REAVIS. I mean of surplus.

Mr. HARRISON. Four million five hundred thousand dollars' worth.

Mr. REAVIS. Not of surplus. There is a total equipment in excess of $4,000,000, but not surplus, and the only thing that the War Department can do under any legislation, unless we want to make appropriations to buy again for the War Department, is to dispose of the surplus, and the surplus, of course, is that portion of the equipment which the department and the Army does not need.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. If the situation is as the gentleman describes, and the War Department fails, even though it appears to be the law, as clearly stated by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], in view of the fact that this distribution of these supplies is held up and we are not able to get results, does the gentleman from Nebraska not think that we better pass the resolution in order to begin to get these supplies moving to the States?

Mr. REAVIS. I will say to the gentleman that it is the purpose, if it is possible to do so, to bring the resolution before the House the first thing to-morrow morning. I would have made the effort and have made the effort to get it before the House earlier, but the subcommittee, from which that resolution comes is composed of three members, two Republicans and one Democrat. The one Democrat has been forced to be away from Washington for several days and will not return until to-morrow. He is the only member from the gentleman's side of the House who heard the testimony, who knows anything about it, and I think it would be unfair to take it up in his absence.

Mr. CANDLER. I think the gentleman is correct about that. His course evidences his usual courtesy and desire at all times to be fair.

Mr. REAVIS. For that reason I asked for the rule to-morrow morning, when he will be present.

Mr. CANDLER. And the gentleman is anxious to get the resolution passed?

Mr. REAVIS. There is nobody more anxious.

Mr. CANDLER. I am glad to hear that, as I am anxious to see the States get these supplies at the earliest possible date.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, the resolution, House resolution No. 362, which the Rules Committee has reported and to which the gentleman from Nebraska refers, if practical results are desired, amounts to nothing. It is simply a House resolution of request, and if adopted would be without the force of law. As the basis for partisan discussion of the demerits of the War Department it may serve a purpose, but it is hard to understand what other object it has.

As pointed out by the gentleman from Nebraska at the last session of Congress, Congress enacted a statute authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over to the Agriculture Department to be distributed amongst the States such surplus implements and materials as the Army no longer needs.

Everyone will realize that if this material is exposed for sale, much of which has been used or abused, the people will realize a very small return in dollars and cents, whereas if utilized for road-building purposes it will be of great practical benefit to the road-construction public, who are the people in the final analysis. In other words, the Government of the United States, representing the people of the United States, should not sell as junk that which the people of the States, who are the people of the United States, badly need for the great road-building program now on foot in practically all the States.

I am informed by the Bureau of Public Roads in the Agriculture Department that the road-building program of the several States aggregates the enormous sum of $750,000,000. I know in my own State the program contemplates an expenditure of $8,000,000. The testimony before the Military Affairs Committee disclosed the fact that many of the States had acted upon the assumption that they would receive their proportion of this surplus under the provisions of the act of Congress to which the gentleman from Nebraska has referred.

This act is very broad in its terms. The Secretary of War is clothed with a broad discretion to turn over to the States for road purposes all equipment which the War Department does not need and which is used for road building. At this session of Congress, in the sundry civil appropriation bill, a clause was inserted that no motor-propelled vehicles should be turned by the War Department to any other department without payment, except such as are authorized by law.

This clause was construed by the Judge Advocate General as repealing the provisions of the act of last session so far as motor-propelled vehicles are concerned. Of course, all distribution to the States ceased. Bills were promptly introduced in the Senate and the House to reinstate the provisions of the act of last session. The House military Affairs Committee has reported House bill 9412 with amendments, and, I understand, is identical in its original form with a Senate bill.

After distribution to the States had ceased by reason of the ruling of the Judge Advocate General, the Attorney General rendered an opinion overruling the opinion of the Judge Advocate General, and the original act is recognized as the law of the land. But the Secretary of War, in a letter to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, has announced his purpose of confining his discretion to the distribution of certain motor-propelled vehicles and of refusing to distribute other essential road-building material. The bill reported by the House Military Affairs Committee makes it mandatory to distribute the material, which it defines as properly road-building material. As well as I can gather from official sources, the motor situation is about this.

The figures I here give were furnished me by the Director of Sales.

At the date of the armistice there were under construction motor vehicles in number 119,625. Contracts were canceled to the number of 78,349, and deliveries were made through the several months, including June, of 41,285. Of these 41,285 vehicles, delivered, 1,018 were passenger cars, 8,568 were motor cycles, 8,545 were side cars; bicycles, 14,890.

There were, of course, a large number on hand at that date.

The following table shows the number shipped overseas since the armistice:

	Trucks.	Automobiles.
November	9,556	1,223
December	3,951	807
January	226	357
February	206	161
March	12	415
April		62
May and June	12	2

The following tables show the declared surplus and its distribution:

Motor-propelled vehicles declared surplus.

April 15	36,589
July	3,000
Total	39,589

Vehicles distributed.

Agricultural Department, for roads	13,035
Agricultural Department, for other purposes	1
Post Office Department	7,900

Total	22,903
Surplus declared	39,589
Surplus distributed	22,903
Balance on hand	16,686

Of which 15,000 are unserviceable and 5,000 will shortly be sold as junk.

A car is treated as unserviceable when the cost of repair will exceed 35 per cent of cost value.

Of the 39,589 declared surplus, 6,000 were passenger cars:

Passenger cars' surplus		6,000

Total		1,847

Of this balance perhaps there is hardly a serviceable vehicle.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman be good enough to state from whom he got those figures?

Mr. HARRISON. I obtained them from the Director of Sales, Mr. Guy Hutchinson. I got them only the other day.

Mr. REAVIS. Does the gentleman know who Mr. Guy Hutchinson is?

Mr. HARRISON. I only know he is the man at the head of the Sales Division. That is all I know. He appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs as such, and the resolution for which the rule was obtained amounts to nothing, because the War Department now claims to be carrying out exactly what that resolution requires. The bill which, I think, has passed the Senate and has been approved by the Committee on Military Affairs makes it mandatory upon the War Department to distribute this material. Now, I say there are about 16,000 undistributed motor-propelled vehicles, of which about 15,000 are unusable, and 5,000 are going to be sold as junk in a very short time, and the resolution for which the rule was obtained amounts really to nothing.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. KINKAID. What will the Senate bill accomplish if enacted?

Mr. HARRISON. It carries a great many materials other than motor vehicles useful for road building and motor vehicles when declared surplus. The Secretary of War says that he will confine his discretion to these motor-propelled vehicles that have been already requisitioned, and he will not extend his authority or his discretion beyond that.

Mr. KINKAID. If the gentleman will pardon a further question, would the Senate bill authorize the distribution of vehicles and implements which would be usable?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; as soon as declared surplus they will. I want to lay before the House——

Mr. KINKAID. There will be some surplus declared?

Mr. HARRISON. There ought to be. I will read figures which I would like to incorporate in the RECORD. I have here the weekly statistical report made by the War Department. Now, they have here a table, which I will put in the RECORD, which anybody can read for himself, in which it shows the number of vehicles that are required for an army of 576,000 men and officers and the surplus. For instance, trailers required for such an arm, 4,302; on hand, 28,015. Bicycles, 5,008 required; on hand, 20,170. Motor cycles, 18,789 on hand; required, 10,874. Special trucks, 5,429 required; and they only have 4,349. Passenger cars, 7,309 required; and only 5,733 on hand.

MOTOR VEHICLES AND BICYCLES REQUIRED FOR AN ARMY OF FIVE CORPS.

Estimated requirements for an army of 5 corps (21 divisions) skeletonized on a peace-time basis, plus the needs for garrisons and posts and special service, including the National Guard, but not providing for universal military training. Estimate based on 1919 tables of organization:

	Required.	On hand.	On hand in per cent of required.
Trailers	4,302	28,015	651
Bicycles	5,008	20,170	403
Motor cycles	10,874	18,789	173
Special trucks	5,429	4,349	80
Passenger cars	7,309	5,733	78
Cargo trucks	20,920	12,091	58

Estimated requirements for the forces enumerated above brought up to war strength according to 1918 tables of organization; universal military training provided for:

	Required.	On hand.	On hand in per cent of required.
Trailers	5,882	28,015	476
Bicycles	7,508	20,170	269
Motor cycles	15,951	18,789	118
Special trucks	7,929	4,349	55
Passenger cars	10,856	5,733	53
Cargo trucks	31,055	12,091	39

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. What does the gentleman refer to when he says "required"—required for what?

Mr. HARRISON. For an Army of 576,000 men. If the Army should be less the surplus will be greater.

Mr. REAVIS. Let me state to the gentleman that there are 158,000 motor vehicles in the hands of the Army in the United States. The gentleman says there are 15,000 surplus. That would leave a motor vehicle for every third man in the Army.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. How much more time would the gentleman desire?

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. I have here and I will put in the RECORD how these vehicles have been distributed and what purchased of the surplus. The bill which has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs contains a second section which refers to a number of articles which are not motor-propelled vehicles but still are very useful in the construction of public roads. The figures given me are as follows:

Equipment available to be transferred		$4,015,000
Total ordered to be transferred		$2,759,000
Tractors transferred to Agricultural Department		$2,353,000
Tractors to Agriculture	number	339
Tractors to Public Health	do	16
Tractors, value $440,000, still available	do	27

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman understands the available amount of road-building material in this country is a very small amount compared with what we had in France; that none of that was available a month after the armistice was signed, because it was turned over to the French?

Mr. HARRISON. I did not know about that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Are those trucks to be turned over to the road-building authorities of the States without compensation?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; they are to be turned over to the States engaged in road building, just as the money is turned over which we have appropriated for road building.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand the gentleman from Nebraska, who preceded the gentleman, to say that it was only to be turned over upon payment therefor.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, no. That is the point that held this matter up. I think, in defense of the War Department, this much can be said, that they had not ascertained the surplus until April. They declared the surplus and began the distribution of these motor vehicles. Then this Congress enacted a provision in the sundry civil deficiency bill which required that no vehicles be turned over except those that were paid for by the various departments unless some provision of law authorized it.

The Judge Advocate General held that that repealed the provision in the act of March or February which authorized the distribution of these things. Ever since August those matters have been held up in the War Department to await action on the part of this Congress, which has never been forthcoming. It was the fault of this Congress in part——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What was the purpose or use of that provision that required payment to be made therefor? How do we get around that?

Mr. HARRISON. The statute says except such as were authorized by law. The Attorney General, overruling the Judge Advocate General, held that the distribution for road purposes was authorized by law, and therefore the deficiency bill provision excepted such distribution.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, as a matter of information, what is the basis of distribution? Is it based upon population or miles of road under construction?

Mr. HARRISON. I trust the bill indorsed by the Military Affairs Committee, which will bring results, will be considered, and the resolution sanctioned by the Rules Committee abandoned as useless.

I believe an opportunity is here offered to aid every State in the Union in its road-building program, which ought not to be neglected.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, the following telegram was sent this morning to Gov. Coolidge, of Massachusetts:

I congratulate you upon your election as a victory for law and order. When law is the issue, all Americans stand together.

(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

[Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Why did not the President send that message before the election?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the bill which is pending proposes an exchange of land in Chesapeake Bay. There are two islands there, one of them Craney Island and the other Fishermans Island. One is owned by the Treasury Department, and the War Department has constructed fortifications on it. The other is owned by the War Department, and the Treasury Department has constructed a quarantine station there. So these islands ought to be transferred to the departments that are really using them, and each department should be given complete jurisdiction over the island it is using.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What use is the Treasury Department making of Craney Island now?

Mr. KAHN. It has a quarantine station on it, with buildings, and so on.

Mr. WALSH. And what use is the War Department making of the other island?

Mr. KAHN. It has put up fortifications thereon.

Mr. WALSH. This use of these tracts of land under the jurisdiction of other departments is only something that has arisen during the war emergency, is it not?

Mr. KAHN. No. I think revocable licenses were granted by the respective departments to the other department.

Mr. WALSH. How long ago?

Mr. KAHN. Some years back.

Mr. WALSH. How long ago?

Mr. KAHN. Some years back. And they have become so important at this time that it is deemed advisable to transfer the title, so that the proper department could exercise full jurisdiction over the island.

Mr. WALSH. Well, do they take possession and control of some of the property of either department when the transfer is made?

Mr. KAHN. No; they will not. The island on which the fortifications are located is now owned and controlled by the Treasury Department. They will turn it over to the War Department, the War Department already having property on that island.

Mr. WALSH. And the Treasury Department having none except the island?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask a question. If this is transferred to the Treasury Department, that means to the Public Health Service?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; practically.

Mr. CANNON. What improvements are there?

Mr. KAHN. I believe there are some buildings there. It is either used as an immigration station or a quarantine station; I have forgotten which.

Mr. CANNON. An immigration station would be under the Department of Labor?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Are there any hospitals there?

Mr. KAHN. No; there are some buildings there that can be used for housing people if they should be quarantined.

Mr. CANNON. Where is this?

Mr. KAHN. Near the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay.

Mr. CANNON. Between Norfolk and the sea?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Are there any hospitals out there?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know that there are any hospitals there.

Mr. CANNON. Well, is it not more important that the Department of Labor should have this if it wanted an immigration station there?

Mr. KAHN. It is used as a quarantine station. I was mistaken about the other. It is now controlled by the Treasury Department, which has jurisdiction of the Quarantine Service—the Public Health Service.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I could a tale unfold, but it is not necessary.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 0.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TRANSFER OF LIGHTHOUSE RESERVATION, NORTH POINT, MD.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I call up the bill S. 2494.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2494) to transfer the tract of land known as the Lighthouse Reservation at North Point, Md., from the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce to the jurisdiction of the War Department.

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described tract of land situated at North Point, Md., now under the control and jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce, and known as the Lighthouse Reservation, at North Point, Md., be, and the same hereby is, transferred to and placed under the control and jurisdiction of the War Department for use for military purposes:

Beginning at a post now set in the ground north, 82 degrees east, 1¼ perches from the center of a stump, and north 65 degrees west, 14 perches from a large black oak tree now marked, and running thence south 65 degrees east, 14 perches to the said black oak, thence still south 65 degrees east, 12½ perches to a post north, 65¾ degrees east, 12 perches to a post standing southwardly 9 feet from a large white oak, thence south 47 degrees east, 48 perches to a marked sassafras, thence still south 47 degrees east, 2 perches to the water of Chesapeake Bay, thence bounding on the water on said bay and Patapsco River south, 74 degrees west 7 perches, south 80½ degrees west 10 perches, north 71 degrees west 15 perches, north 57½ degrees west 12 perches, north 46½ degrees west, 12 perches, north 46½ degrees west, 44.8 perches, until it intersects a line drawn south 48 degrees west from the place of beginning, and thence to the beginning, containing 7 acres and 22 square perches of land more or less.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, this tract of land which it is proposed to transfer has been partly under the jurisdiction of the War Department since 1898. In 1898, by a revocable permit, the island was transferred to the War Department. The Department of Commerce has no real use for the island, while the War Department has a considerable use for it. This legislation will permit that transfer to be made. I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The SPEAKER. The bill has already been read a second time. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is asked for.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 0.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDING THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I call up the bill H. R. 3706.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California calls up the bill H. R. 3706, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I shall not object to a gentleman having leave to extend his remarks where there is no good reason for his not doing so. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KAHN. There is a Senate bill pending that is exactly identical with the House bill. I ask that the Senate bill be considered in lieu of the House bill, and that it be read in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the Senate bill be read in lieu of the House bill. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will please take the chair. The Chair is informed that the Senate bill 1373 has not yet been reported, that it is still pending in the Committee on Military Affairs. Therefore it is appropriate to move to discharge the committee.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 1373.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate bill 1373, and that it be substituted for the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1373, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1373, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That article 112 of section 342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, approved July 9, 1918, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"ARTICLE 112. EFFECTS OF DECEASED PERSONS—DISPOSITION OF.—In case of the death of any person subject to military law the commanding officer of the place of command will permit the legal representative or widow of the deceased, if present, to take possession of all his effects then in camp or quarters, and if no legal representative or widow be present the commanding officer shall direct a summary court to secure all such effects, and said summary court shall have authority to collect and receive any debts due decedent's estate by local debtors; and as soon as practicable after the collection of such effects said summary court shall transmit such effects, and any money collected, through the Quartermaster Department, at Government expense, to the widow or legal representative of the deceased, if such be found by said court, or to the son, daughter father, provided the father has not abandoned the support of his family, mother, brother, sister, or the next of kin in the order named, if such be found by said court, or the beneficiary named in the will of the deceased, if such be found by said court, and said court shall thereupon make to the War Department a full report of its transactions; but if there be none of the persons hereinabove named, or such persons or their addresses are not known to or readily ascertainable by said court, and the said court shall so find, said summary court shall have authority to convert into cash, by public or private sale, not earlier than 30 days after the death of the deceased, all effects of deceased except sabers, insignia, decorations, medals, watches, trinkets, manuscripts, and other articles valuable chiefly as keepsakes; and as soon as practicable after converting such effects into cash said summary court shall deposit with the proper officer, to be designated in regulations, any cash belonging to decedent's estate, and shall transmit a receipt for such deposits, any will or other papers of value belonging to the deceased, any sabers, insignia, decorations, medals, watches, trinkets, manuscripts, and other articles valuable chiefly as keepsakes together with an inventory of the effects secured by said summary court, and a full account of its transactions to the War Department for transmission to the Auditor for the War Department for action as authorized by law in the settlement of accounts of deceased officers and enlisted men of the Army.

"The provisions of this article shall be applicable to inmates of the United States Soldiers' Home who die in any United States military hospital outside of the District of Columbia where sent from the home for treatment."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to make certain amendments to article 112 of the Articles of War relating to the disposition of the effects of deceased persons. The amendments that are proposed are simply those which have been found by years of administration of the law to be practical suggestions for the improvement of the law and to further the carrying out of its original intent.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BEE. Have those amendments been reported?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is the bill itself that makes the amendments.

Mr. BEE. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Where they have authority to receive any debts due to the deceased's estate from a local debtor, what would become of the question of paying debts that require an administrator to collect? How would you get around that?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is a matter for the civil courts. All that this does, if the gentleman will inquire into it, is to provide a means whereby the Army, having in its custody temporarily the effects of a deceased man, may turn them over to the representative of the deceased.

Mr. BEE. I am in favor of the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We are not administering his estate in any sense.

Mr. BEE. I am in favor of the bill, but I was afraid of this clause—to receive any debts due to the deceased's estate from local debtors.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Suppose an officer in the garrison owed $25 to the deceased, and it is paid in and made part of the effects sent back to his family. The changes proposed here do not run to the principle of the law. It is not originally intended to administer the officer's estate. It means that the Army will turn over to somebody who will subsequently take care of them those effects that are found in the garrison when the man dies. All the changes that are proposed—as the gentlemen may see if they will turn to the second page of the report accompanying the bill, upon which the original text of the article 112 is printed—are these: If you go down about 10 lines you will see, after the words "or to the son, daughter, father," the words "next of kin" are written in; and then, after the word "father," we have written in "Provided, That the father has not abandoned the support of his family."

There are one or two small verbal changes that do not affect the sense or intention; and in another place, after the words "the beneficiary named," the words are written in, "in the will of the deceased" instead of "the beneficiary named by the deceased," as the original text provided.

Now, I will say the only purpose of this bill is to profit by the experience in the operation of this article 112 for a good many years and to provide by this change that some of the accidents and circumstances which have hitherto confused and perhaps made the operation of this article miscarry shall be avoided. You can get a good idea of that perhaps from the very words that I read here:

Provided the father has not abandoned the support of his family.

It would manifestly be improper and unjust, and altogether contrary to the intention of the act, to turn over this personal property of the dead officer or soldier to the father when it was known that the father was not living with the family, had abandoned it and gone away, in which case it ought to go to the next of kin.

Mr. WINGO. That would not always be true. I happen to know of a case, not in my district or in my State, of the father of a soldier who acted very properly in abandoning the family. The family consisted of a wife and one daughter, and the father could not maintain his self-respect and live with them. The father and the son were of the same opinion, although they were much humiliated by the conditions. The only one that the boy had anything to do with was the father. Now, why should that father be denied the effects of his son, and those effects be turned over to the mother, who really was not entitled to any consideration by reason of the life she was living?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Let me suggest to the gentleman that, as a lawyer, he understands that a law must be written so as to be of general application, rather than to provide for unusual and peculiar circumstances.

Mr. WINGO. But the law does not make any exception like that which you are making here.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Just a moment. If the relations which you suggest existed between father and son, it is very probable that the son would have given notice where his property was to go and not let this automatic law take effect.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, not one boy in a thousand ever thinks of what is going to become of his effects when he goes into the Army.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then, take it on that ground. Supposing the father was the only one who was justly entitled to the effects of the son, and the family had really abandoned the father, and the son was living with him, would not the father have the right to go into court and get the property?

Mr. WINGO. Not under this law. You are undertaking to fix a law to govern this. If it were not for this article of war, then the laws of the States on the descent and distribution of personal as well as real property would control, but the present Articles of War, which you do not remedy by the amendment, say "the widow or legal representative." In some States the father is not considered a legal representative, because the property would go to a brother in preference to a father, because in most of the States property descends before it ascends, and going to the father or mother is considered an ascent and not a descent. That is the trouble with this whole article, that you disturb the laws of descent and distribution that are in effect in most of the States. You bar the father. Under the article as it now exists the father can not go to the camp and get the effects of his son, and you do not remedy it by this.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman from Arkansas will yield, the purpose of the bill is not to change the law of distribution. The purpose of the bill is simply to name some person who, if the soldier dies, shall receive temporarily the effects of the soldier. The estate of the soldier must be administered by the courts.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman permit me there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman certainly is too good a lawyer to make the contention he has just made. I presume the gentleman is a lawyer.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Let me read him the language. The gentleman is discussing a legal proposition. You say you collect the property temporarily and then turn it over.

Mr. KAHN. That is the idea.

Mr. WINGO. And the gentleman says that then the law of descent and distribution of the State controls. I say it does not control. On page 2, line 5, appears this language:

> And as soon as practicable after the collection of such effects said summary court shall transmit such effects, and any money collected, through the Quartermaster Department, at Government expense—

To whom? To the person entitled to them under the law of domicile of the soldier? No—> to the widow or legal representative of the deceased, if such be found by said court, or to the son, daughter, father, provided the father has not abandoned the support of his family, mother, brother, sister, or the next of kin in the order named.

In other words, you set up a legal rule for the distribution of personal property of soldiers by this act.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No.

Mr. KAHN. No; the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I have tried to tell the gentleman from Arkansas the very same thing, that this is not for the purpose of establishing a probate court to administer the effects of the deceased, but it is a gathering up of the personal property of the deceased soldier for the purpose of turning it over to a custodian. This is a military court, not a civil court.

Mr. WINGO. I know that; but you provide that this military court shall distribute the personal property of the deceased soldier to the person whom you designate.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And the law of the State can reach the custodian and determine the distribution of the property.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; but if the gentleman has had experience such as I have, he knows that possession is nine points of the law.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The Army is simply getting rid of property on its hands.

Mr. WINGO. The trouble is there is too much red tape. I will gladly welcome the assistance of the gentleman to get the property of a soldier which I have been trying for two years to get. The trouble under the present article of war, which you do not remedy here, is that it provides a different rule from that of the States. If you provided that the commanding officer should turn over the property to the person entitled to receive it under the laws of the domicile of the soldier, then you would remedy the situation some.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That would make it necessary to turn the commanding officer into a court, and he would have to be a lawyer. But he is a military man, and all he wants to do is to relinquish the custody of the property which he has in his hands.

Mr. WINGO. There is no trouble in any other department.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The only intention is to put it into the hands of somebody by whom it may be lawfully and properly distributed through the probate court.

Mr. WINGO. Why not put it into the hands of somebody who is entitled to it under the law? There is no State in the Union that has such a rule of distribution as this.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This is not a rule of distribution. It is a rule of custody.

Mr. WINGO. It is a rule of distribution.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; it is not a rule of distribution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman. Now, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Arkansas has been mixed. In the first place, the officer in command of a post is not familiar with the laws of descent of the whole country. A soldier happens to die and leave a little personal property. In order to send this promptly to some of his folks the law tries to fix a series of relatives who shall receive it in the order named in the bill. Then, when it comes to that person, if any of the kin are interested in procuring possession of the property they will begin proceedings in the probate court of the State.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; but why do you adopt an order providing for the delivery to persons not in conformity with the rule of distribution in a single State in the Union? Why do you not adopt an order here that they shall turn this property over and adopt the ordinary rule of distribution?

Mr. KAHN. There may be only 100 soldiers at a camp, and no judge advocate there and no lawyer.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is talking about one thing and I am talking about another. I ask him why you do not write in here that the property shall go to the person that ordinarily is entitled to receive it?

Mr. KAHN. The officer in command would have to know the law.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman now does not catch my question. Why do you not, instead of saying it shall go in the order named here—why do you not take the ordinary order and write it into the law here?

Mr. KAHN. Because the ordinary order changes in different States. It is not the same in every State.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas that he perhaps is under the impression that this seeks to administer the soldier's effects.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We are not seeking to exercise a judicial function, but merely a military one, to relieve the officer in charge of the post of the custody of the property and have another party take charge of the personal effects that the dead man has left as soon as possible. The officer gathers up the effects and sends them to these people in the designated order and gets them off his hands. After that the civil process will operate, wherever the soldier was domiciled, in the administration of his effects through the probate court.

Mr. WINGO. I am not talking about their acting as a probate court. Why is it you do not include the right of a father to take the boy's effects?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Because the experience has been, and the suggestion of the War Department——

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman from Vermont let me answer the gentleman from Arkansas? I have a case in point. A boy was killed in France. His watch and ring and other personal effects were left. His father had abandoned the family and for 20 years had paid no attention to them. The mother had reared the boy. Should the father be entitled to those personal effects?

Mr. WINGO. A little while ago I gave an illustration just the opposite. You ought not to bar the father absolutely because one father has acted badly.

Mr. BEE. If he had not supported his family, if he had abandoned his family, he ought not to have charge of those personal effects.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The language of the bill is "provided the father has not abandoned the support of his family." If he abandoned his family, he ought not to have the personal effects. They are mostly keepsakes and trinkets, little things which the deceased leaves when he dies at an Army post.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I would like five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, there is no difference between the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Vermont and myself with reference to the object to be attained. We all want to simplify the procedure by which the personal effects may be turned over to the proper person. But I am afraid this amendment does not do that. I am for anything that will stop holding these effects. My experience has been very exasperating in regard to this matter, and I am for any proposition that will give the proper party the goods and effects, effects not worth sometimes much in money, but worth everything to the father. I have one case in point—a watch which had been in the family for generations, handed down from father to son. Here is what you do if you undertake to say that the commanding officer can deliver it to two persons—first the widow or the legal representative. The gentleman from California says that if you undertake to provide that you shall turn them over to the person entitled to them by law of the soldier's domicile that you have to make a lawyer out of the commanding officer. You certainly have to make a lawyer out of the commanding officer if you make him decide who is the legal representative that you provide for.

Mr. KAHN. No; there is a court that passes on that.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, well, why not provide it could be delivered directly to the father or to the mother—of course if he is married the widow is entitled to it—and then, if you want to provide with respect to either one having abandoned the family you can do it. But in the first instance, the commanding officer can deliver it to the widow or to the legal representative. If he does not know who the legal representative is, and he would not know in some States, he can then do like every other department of the Government does—demand that their authority be presented. In most instances they come along and show authority. They could cite the commanding officer to the section of the statute of the State, which is available to the Judge Advocate's department, and the man could turn it over, but if the widow is not present, or if the soldier is single, the commanding officer now does what he will do under this. He will say, "I do not know who the legal representative is," and he will not send it to anybody, he will hold it, and a Congressman may beg for it. They will tell you that they do not know where it is, that they have searched and that they can not find it, and what do you provide? You provide that in that case he shall send it at Government expense to the Quartermaster Department. Why go to the expense of transporting this over the country and sending it to the Quartermaster Department? Then that department will have to have a showing made to it as to who is the legal representative.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This article of war is exactly as its name indicates—one of those rough-and-ready makeshifts by which men in charge, in the exigencies of military life, may have some quick means of disposing of the exigency. What would you do with a little detachment of men in the field, where a man dies and has some property? Would the gentleman have the matter go to the Supreme Court of the United States before that property could be gotten out of the Army's hands?

Mr. WINGO. No. I will tell the gentleman what the officer would do, if he has enough sense to be an officer, in such a contingency. The officer would have the dead man's companions put together his effects, his watch, his pictures, his letters, and he would seal them up in a package and send them to his superior commanding officer of that particular camp. That is what the average soldier would do in the field. What would that commanding officer do, if he was not restricted by some provisions as you have here? He would notify the relatives of the deceased soldier, and then he would send the effects on to the relatives whenever he was satisfied that the person demanding them was the proper legal representative, but that is not the way that it is done now.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. WINGO. Can the gentleman tell me how it is done now by the officer out in the field? How does he do it now?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. He makes the first thumb-hand rule that may suit the circumstances, just as anybody would do.

Mr. WINGO. They do the thing we are trying to get around by this amendment; but these amendments restrict the right of the father instead of extending the right of the father. The trouble is that your present article of war has most of the language in it now that this bill has. The gentleman points out the changes made——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Exactly; and they are made as a result of experience, which showed they are necessary.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, you want to shut it up and restrict it instead of extending it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this bill, it is not what the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] believes it to be. This is not to provide for the distribution of personal property as personal property is distributed by the laws of inheritance of a State. It is to give authority and direction to officers of the Army to deliver the meager belongings of a deceased soldier into the hands of some responsible person, a relative of the deceased, who will keep them, if entitled to do so, or who will act as custodian of them so that they will reach the hands of the person who is entitled to the possession of them. If any question arises as to the right of any such person as custodian to hold and keep the property, that question can be determined in a proper proceeding in a court having jurisdiction of the persons and the property. I do not see that this law is a law for the distribution of property in the sense of determining the person or persons who at the time have or are later to have the right of permanent possession; it is simply to find somebody into whose hands it shall be placed, somebody to relieve the War Department of the duty and burden of keeping it until a court shall determine the title or right of possession. The title can be determined later, if there is a controversy in respect to it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Does it not go further than that? Does it not state to whom you shall distribute it, and do you not for the purpose of Army administration set up a rule of distribution?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. By its terms it simply suggests persons to be preferred and the order in which they may be preferred, but practically only as custodians by the War Department.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I have only five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Is not that all that a law of distribution in any statute of a State does?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. No; it is not. A statute of a State relating to inheritance and descent of property and a judgment of a court under that statute are for the purpose of determining the descent of intestate property; to determine not the temporary custodian but the person or persons who are to have title to and permanent possession of property.

A court, in pursuance of a statute, determines the final ownership and right of possession of property. This does not undertake to do anything of that kind.

And as to the particular case the gentleman cites, where there was a separation of a husband from his wife and daughter, in my humble judgment the husband would not be held by a court to have abandoned his family. They, being wholly at fault, would be held to have abandoned him; at least he would be justified in leaving them and in living apart from them, and in doing so he would lose none of his rights as to the property of his son. And the rule is the same as to the wife. If she leaves his home on account of his misconduct—justifying divorce—she takes all her rights with her. It seems to me this bill is entirely proper; it provides simply for finding a temporary—and I think I use the proper word—custodian of property, somebody with whom the War Department can deal without delay. If there is later a dispute or controversy as to who is permanently entitled to the property, the matter can be tried in a court. Difficulty would arise, possibly, in some cases. Property of some value may be put into the hands of one who is not really entitled to hold it permanently, and it may be difficult to recover the property from him, but that often happens.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. After all, the effect of this bill, apart from what the gentleman said or rather in continuation of it, is that by enumerating these different persons in the law the officer who has the present custody may know to whom he may safely intrust this property awaiting final decision, and thereby relieve him of the responsibility of making any particular choice.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In other words, it is informing to him and instructional to him as to whom he can deliver this property and thus relieve his own responsibility for it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman is right.

Mr. KAHN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE].

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, in many of these far western posts we have this situation: A soldier dies. There is no definite information as to his heirs. This bill merely authorizes a transfer out of the post into the custody of some one else of the personal property only. There is not very much personal property at best. These men are not men endowed with great wealth. There is probably a watch, a ring, a chain, and a little individual keepsake or perhaps a few dollars. This bill prevents the accumulation in the camp of this property until the heirs or the courts settle who is to receive it. It merely transfers from the post to some party who in the civil courts can have the matter determined. It occurs to me, in spite of the suggestion of the gentleman from Arkansas, that it expedites, enhances, and hastens getting the property into the hands of the relatives and friends instead of delaying it.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. I will.

Mr. WINGO. That is not new in this bill; it is the present law. Now, the thing we are trying to get away from is that the present law does not expedite. Can the gentleman name a single soldier whose personal effects have been obtained——

Mr. BEE. No, sir, I can not; but I can name a great many soldiers whose personal effects are being held in the custody of the War Department until the heirs can be ascertained. It is the question of getting a watch, a chain, or a ring——

Mr. WINGO. But this act will not have that effect——

Mr. BEE. This act will have that effect, in my opinion. It will have the effect of transferring the entire troublesome question of determining who they will be and not make the Army hold it at any place with the attendant risk and at the same time have to pass upon the relative rights of another party. The only objection I have got is that we ought to put the sister before the brother in reference to personal effects.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. BEE. If I have time; I see the gavel——

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is a lawyer; what authority has Congress to undertake to decide who shall have preference?

Mr. BEE. None at all.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And it does not.

Mr. WINGO. The plain language of the provision is that they shall deliver the property.

Mr. BEE. And relieve the Army camps from——

Mr. WINGO. The only thing Congress can do is to turn it over to the legal heirs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That article 112 of section 342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, approved July 9, 1918," be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. Evidently by typographical error, in the Senate engrossed bill print, as well as the Senate printed bill, line 3 is made to read "That article 112 of section 342 of the Revised Statutes of." That should read "1342," and I move an amendment to strike out, in line 3, the figures "342" and insert in lieu thereof "1342."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, amend by striking out the figures "342" and insert in lieu thereof "1342."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Is the bill now open for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being read for amendment.

Mr. WINGO. And the first paragraph only has been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The first paragraph has been read. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

ART. 122. Effects of diseased persons, disposition of: In case of the death of any person subject to military law the commanding officer of the place of command will permit the legal representative or widow of the deceased, if present, to take possession of all of his effects then in camp or quarters, and if no legal representative or widow be present the commanding officer shall direct a summary court to secure all such effects; and said summary court shall have authority to collect and receive any debts due decedent's estate by local debtors; and as soon as practicable after the collection of such effects said summary court shall transmit such effects, and any money collected through the Quartermaster Department, at Government expense, to the widow or legal representative of the deceased, if such be found by said court, or to the son, daughter, father, provided the father has not abandoned the support of his family, mother, brother, sister, or the next of kin in the order named, if such be found by said court, or the beneficiary named in the will of the deceased, if such be found by said court, and said court shall thereupon make to the War Department a full report of its transactions; but if there be none of the persons hereinabove named, or such persons or their addresses are not known to or readily ascertainable by said court, and the said court shall so find, said summary court shall have authority to convert into cash, by public or private sale, not earlier than 30 days after the death of the deceased, all effects of deceased except sabers, insignia, decorations, medals, watches, trinkets, manuscripts, and other articles valuable chiefly as keepsakes; and as soon as practicable after converting such effects into cash said summary court shall deposit with the proper officer, to be designated in regulations, any cash belonging to decedent's estate, and shall transmit a receipt for such deposits, any will or other papers of value belonging to the deceased, any sabers, insignia, decorations, medals, watches, trinkets, manuscripts, and other articles valuable chiefly as keepsakes, together with an inventory of the effects secured by said summary court, and a full account of its transactions to the War Department for transmission to the Auditor for the War Department for action as authorized by law in the settlement of accounts of deceased officers and enlisted men of the Army.

The provisions of this article shall be applicable to inmates of the United States Soldiers' Home who die in any United States military hospital outside of the District of Columbia where sent from the home for treatment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 2, reverse the position of the words "brother, sister" so that "sister" will precede "brother."

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indicate the line?

Mr. BLANTON. Line 12.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman care to discuss that?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not care to discuss it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will permit me to make a suggestion, that this, of course—what we have been trying to emphasize for the last half hour—does not give title to the property.

Mr. BLANTON. But it says in the order named.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is simply a depository—the order in which this officer may release the custody of this property. Now, it might easily be that the brother—the male—under the circumstances may be the most convenient person to intrust this to, because ultimately it is going to be submitted, perhaps, to somebody else——

Mr. BLANTON. But I would rather make the sister temporary custodian than the brother——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman is sure with his experience with our human family——

Mr. BLANTON (continuing). Because I think sisters appreciate it more. Women, I think, appreciate things of that kind more—keepsakes and family articles.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I desire to suggest again to the gentleman that she is not necessarily going to get them. She is made to be a servant in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 2, line 9, of the Senate printed bill, transpose the word "sister" so that the line will read: "Mother, sister, brother, or the next of kin."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up any time discussing the proposition; but in reply to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] I will state that this involves merely a temporary custodian of the property, it is true; but we men of experience in the ordinary affairs of life certainly understand that the women of our country do take more interest in keepsakes and heirlooms than we men do. And I think, if we are going to prescribe the order of even temporary custodians of such property, preference should be given to the sister rather than to the brother. That is the purpose of the amendment. It is not a matter of any great importance, but yet, of whatever importance it is, since any preference is sought to be given, I think the preference should be given to the woman.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not prevail. I recognize the fact that the women do lay more stress upon keepsakes than men do. But here is your situation: Suppose the soldier has a sister when he goes into the Army; while he is away she marries and changes her name altogether, possibly goes away from the neighborhood where the family has lived for many years. The brothers remain in that neighborhood; it is much easier for the War Department officials to transfer to a brother than it is to some sister under those circumstances. We speak of "brothers and sisters." The brother comes first in the ordinary affairs of life. If I thought for a moment that some really great good could be accomplished, I would not object to the amendment, but I think it would be much easier to find the brother than it would be, possibly, to find the sister.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition. I move to strike out the last word.

The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] need not be in a hurry to get a vote on this. It is a very important matter. It is to be regretted that the committee confined itself in amending article of war 112 to a simple change or two, that would make it more difficult for the father to get the personal effects of the son when he dies in camp. I am not going to offer an amendment, because I recognize that when you undertake to amend articles like this on the floor you are doing a very dangerous thing. I trust that members of the committee will go into this matter further and not simply think of one case, where a father is not worthy. The only material amendment you put in here is to provide that a father who has abandoned his family shall not receive the effects, and that is the most material amendment.

The gentleman talks about a summary court. It does not make any difference what you call it, this Congress has no authority to set up any court of probate jurisdiction over the effects, personal or otherwise, of any citizen of this land. Of course, all you do by this is to give directions to a commanding officer as to whom he shall deliver the personal effects of a deceased soldier. Now, if you did not have article of war No. 112, the law would compel the commanding officer to do what? To deliver the property to the person who is entitled to the possession of it under the law of the domicile of the deceased soldier. Now, when you undertake to provide that nobody but a legal representative or the widow can get the effects at the camp, what do you do?

Under this bill and under the present law the father may stand there and say, "I want these effects"; the mother may stand there and say, "I want these effects"; the brother may stand there and say, "Here is a letter from father and mother, and he was my only brother, and I want these effects"; or the sister may come there to camp and say, "He was my brother; I want the effects"; a Congressman may go to the camp and say, "I represent the father of the deceased soldier. The soldier had a watch that had been in the family since Revolutionary days. Here is a letter from the father telling me to get it, and I want it." But you can not get it. You have to turn it over to a summary court and send it to the Quartermaster Department at Government expense, tie it up in Washington in storage, and then when you call on the War Department they say, "We have no record of any effects left by the soldier, but will ask the commanding officer to report," and months elapse and finally you are told the soldier left no effects. What becomes of the boy's watch? Such a policy is silly. It would be common sense to let the commanding officer turn the property over to the father or mother. Everybody in this House knows that if the father is not entitled to the property the court can compel him by summary process to deliver it over to the person that is entitled to it. Any lawyer knows that. So you are not trying to meet that kind of a situation but just trying to add a little more red tape to the already burdensome red tape, which has so far caused most of the effects of the deceased soldiers, which are purely sentimental in value, to be lost at the camps. And this only adds to the interminable processes along that line.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I want to rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] is unduly frightened. During this war a great many boys were killed. When the soldiers' pockets were searched there was a little money found, possibly, or there was some trinket found or he had a watch on his wrist. The soldier probably carried a photograph of his sweetheart. Now, the purpose of the legislation is to enable the commanding officer immediately upon the death of a soldier to gather those effects, put them into a package, convene three officers to determine among themselves, from his effects if they can, to whom they should send the package for division among the relatives, if the relatives should go into a court to ask that the estate be divided. The officer who sends the material to one of the family does not know positively whether that person is entitled to it or not. But suppose there were two or three brothers of the deceased; under the reasoning of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] the officer would have to determine the division of the property to show which articles each brother ought to receive. The purpose of the legislation is simply to enable the War Department officers to determine among themselves to whom they will send the materials, and the question of subsequent disposal is another matter and will be settled in the courts if the case should be taken into court.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 38.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 1373) to amend the Articles of War, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to report the same back forthwith with an amendment after the word "widow," on page 1, line 11, of the House print of the bill, by inserting the words "father or mother," so that it will read, "will permit the legal representative or widow, father, or mother of the deceased, if present, to take possession," and so forth.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WINGO moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: Page 1, line 11, after the word "widow," insert the words "father or mother."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WINGO. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 5, noes 37.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of no quorum. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll. As many as favor the motion to recommit will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 49, nays 193, answered "present" 2, not voting 188, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The nays have it, and the motion to recommit is rejected. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that House bill 3746, which is identical with the Senate bill just passed, be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SURPLUS DENTAL OUTFITS.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs I call up House joint resolution 222, directing the Secretary of War to dispose of surplus dental outfits.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, calls up a House joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. This joint resolution is on the Union Calendar. Accordingly the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution 222.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas on November 11, 1918, the day the armistice was signed, there were in round numbers 5,000 commissioned dental officers on duty; and

Whereas since the discharge of a large majority of these dental officers there are many thousand dental outfits in the hands of the Government and not in use; and

Whereas these outfits will inevitably deteriorate and become useless in a short time if stored away as they now are; and

Whereas thousands of these dental officers who before entering the service disposed of their private outfits and are now without them: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to dispose of all dental outfits not in use and not immediately needed by the Government: Provided, That they shall be sold preferentially to an honorably discharged dental officer and at a price not to exceed 25 per cent of the first cost to the Government: Provided further, That after the period of six months after this act goes into effect these dental outfits may be disposed of to the general trade: And provided further, That all dental outfits or parts thereof so purchased shall be invoiced, packed, and delivered to any railroad station within the United States designated by the purchaser without additional cost for packing and shipping.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to sell at public or private sale, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, all dental supplies in excess of the needs of the Government, preferentially to persons who served in the Army of the United States during the recent war and who are at the time of such sale licensed to practice dentistry."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD].

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, it happens that the War Department has on hand a very large amount of dental equipment and supplies such as are usually used in dentistry. Now, we have a provision of law that war supplies of this character shall be sold preferentially to the Navy, to the Marine Corps, to the Red Cross, and one or two others. Those are public purposes, and the provision of law is that those public purposes shall have preferential recognition. That is, the War Department can turn these things over to the Navy or to the Marine Corps under existing law.

The purpose of this joint resolution, and its only purpose, is to authorize the Secretary of War to sell at private sale to men who served in the war who are now licensed to practice dentistry. The bill originally introduced by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] provided that the War Department should sell to such dentists, apparently in recognition of their services in the war, at 25 per cent of the original cost of these supplies. No one can fail to recognize that it would be a very fine thing to give something to any soldier, but the committee was unable to see any very good reason why the War Department should give 75 per cent of the value of these things to those particular soldiers who served in the war who happen to be dentists.

These supplies are now very rare. Many of the dentists who went into the war gave up their practice, sold their outfits, and now find themselves upon their return to civil life unable to buy the equipment that is necessary to reestablish themselves in their profession, at least without paying a very exorbitant price. I can see absolutely no reason why the War Department should grant to one soldier a money bonus—and that would be the effect of the original bill—in preference to any other soldier.

The bill as it is amended by the committee allows the War Department, in its own discretion and under its own rules, to sell at a fair, reasonable price at private sale, without advertisement to the public, to any soldier who is a dentist and who served honorably in the war. It also provides that dentists who served in the war shall be given a preference over every other private interest. That prevents the dealers in supplies in dentistry from coming in and buying these things from the Government at private sale and provides that the dentist who is actually licensed to practice his profession shall have this preference.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I will.

Mr. JONES of Texas. What was the purpose in taking out of the bill the direction to the Secretary of War to sell these supplies? Is it the purpose to leave it in his discretion?

Mr. SANFORD. That was the exact purpose. This is an administrative matter. I take the position that Congress ought not to specify the details, but should put the responsibility where it belonged, on the Secretary of War, to sell these supplies at a fair and reasonable price within the limits of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I agree with the gentleman; but the question whether they should be sold or not should not be left to the Secretary of War. The details should be left to him, but it seems to me that it would be well to direct him to sell them.

Mr. SANFORD. I think it is advisable to avoid the use of the word "direct" as often as possible. The object of this bill is to get these supplies into the hands of bona fide soldier dentists as early as possible.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will yield, has it not always been the construction of the executive branch of the Government that the word "may" shall be construed as a direction?

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any large surplus of these supplies now on hand available for distribution?

Mr. SANFORD. I am advised that there is a very large supply.

Mr. BRIGGS. The reason I ask the question is that I had inquiries from my district and was informed by the War Department that they did not have any surplus on hand at this time, but if it developed later on they would be glad to give consideration to its distribution.

Mr. SANFORD. I think the War Department had this matter in mind when they gave that information.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, it is not my purpose to occupy much time on this matter, so I will be as brief as possible.

The genesis of this resolution comes out of a demand by the dental officers of the late war. When they enlisted in the Federal service some of them sold their dental outfits to the Government at prevailing prices and others disposed of them to individuals or dealers at whatever price they could obtain. This was done not only by reason of their belief as to the indeterminate duration of the war, but also because of the well-known difficulty of preserving them from rust and general deterioration resulting from lack of use. Now that war is over, they find themselves not only with impaired vocations, but without the professional equipment to pursue the same. This is a great hardship upon these patriotic men, especially since their enlistment and discharge dental outfits have increased more than 300 per cent in their selling price.

This injustice was called to my attention by certain dentists of my State, who asked me to interest myself in the matter, with a view, if possible, of correcting it.

For the information of the House it might be well to state a few pertinent facts in relation to this resolution. At the beginning of the war with Germany there were 86 commissioned dental officers. At the signing of the armistice there were 5,000 commissioned dental officers, 3,600 of whom were on duty in the United States and the remainder in foreign service. There are, approximately, at this time, 4,000 dental officers demobilized or discharged from the service. The Government owns about 6,000 dental outfits.

About 5,000 of these outfits are stored away in various places, such as camps, cantonments, and warehouses throughout the country. About 1,000 of them are in use. An Army of 350,000 men would be allowed by law 700 dental officers and would not need more than 1,000 of these outfits, so that there could be sold without detriment to the service 4,000 of them. It is nearly a year since the armistice was signed. I am informed that the War Department has refused to sell either outfits or parts of the same to discharged dental officers, assigning as a reason its intention of turning them over to the Health Service.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Can the gentleman give us any information as to why they waited so long before moving to have this equipment sold?

Mr. LAYTON. I am coming to that.

Mr. JONES of Texas. One further question. Would it not have been much better to have sold this property to the men as they were discharged instead of waiting until they got back and got their equipment?

Mr. LAYTON. My judgment is that as a matter of good business, as fast as a dental officer was discharged the War Department should have allowed him to take a dental outfit home with him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Delaware has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. LAYTON. The charge is also made that the reason for this is due to an agreement between the manufacturers and the Government that none of these outfits should be for sale after the termination of the war.

I do not wish to be understood as indorsing these statements. I am compelled to say, however—and it is very regrettable—that suspicions and direct charges of this character have been directed against the Government, wherever it entered into contractual obligations for supplies during the war, including the Beef Trusts, the vegetable and fruit canner, the automobile manufacturer, the cotton and woolen manufacturer, down to the manufacturer of the pick and shovel. While I am addressing the House on this subject, I desire to say that I shall introduce another resolution relating to the disposition of vast quantities of medical and surgical supplies, including all sorts of surgical instruments and appliances now held by the Government far beyond its needs. There are millions upon millions of cotton-gauze bandages, for instance, held in storage by the Government which now retail for from 15 to 30 cents when the prewar price was 5 cents. They should be disposed of for the benefit of the whole people.

I find that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has a bill dealing with supplies, and when that bill comes before the House I wish to oppose it. In addition to dental outfits there is a vast amount of supplies of all kinds that are required in hospital and civilian practice that are needed in this country for the benefit of our people. I am opposed to a bill which I understand will be presented whereby all this vast material will be handed over to the Red Cross solely for use in foreign countries. There are only three of us who represent the medical profession in the House. I assume to say that the medical profession of the United States to-day needs these supplies here in America. Bandages which before the war cost 5 cents now cost from 15 to 30 cents, and everything else in proportion; and to take those supplies out of the country instead of giving them to hospitals and other institutions and then to those engaged in private practice, in my judgment is neglecting our first duty. [Applause.]

There is no reason why the Government, in these days of high prices, should not dispose of everything which it possesses beyond its proper needs and necessities in order to reduce prices generally. Surely it is evident that the people should have this consideration shown them, inasmuch as there is no dispute that the manufacturer and the laborer reaped phenomenal profits during the war, and could therefore well afford to endure a temporary abatement of profits when the national need is so imperative. That the national need is imperative needs no extended arguments. Clinical developments of recent years prove conclusively the relation between decayed teeth and dental abscesses, which is the especial province of the dentist's activity, and many diseases arising therefrom, such as rheumatism, pneumonia, and many other pathological conditions due to germs generated in the maxillary regions of the body. Sound teeth have been found one of the primary requisites to the health of the soldier. They are no less requisite to the health of the civilian, and I again repeat that all these superfluous dental outfits should be made immediately available for the people in the cities, towns, and villages throughout the land. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, in this time I am going to read a letter from The Adjutant General in regard to returning some of our troops from Russia. [Applause.] Unfortunately, I am sure my colleagues will not smile when I tell them that those landing this week are coming here in their coffins. The Secretary informs me that 111 of those that were buried in Siberia, that we understood were being sent to Brest, in France, there to remain temporarily, have been ordered directly home. They will come on the 9th of this month on the steamship Lake Daraga.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, November 1, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM E. MASON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MASON: With reference to your inquiry relative to the return of bodies of deceased soldiers from north Siberia, I beg to say that report has been received from the commanding general, American Forces in France, that 111 bodies evacuated from north Siberia are being returned to the United States on the steamship Lake Daraga, which is due to arrive at New York about November 9. No report has been received as to the names of the soldiers whose bodies are returned, but when received their relatives will be communicated with as to the disposition they desire made of the bodies.

Very truly, yours,

P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

I wish simply to remark, as I file this letter here, that it would be a good time for the Congress to consider the question of continuing our sending American troops into Siberia. It is the announced policy of the department not to return these soldiers from Siberia until volunteers are found to take their places. As I have stated to you before—and I dislike to repeat—the sending of these soldiers to Siberia and into northern Russia was an absolute violation of the Constitution of the United States. Congress has declared no war there. According to the statement made by the Secretary of War before the Committee on Military Affairs when I was present these soldiers were not fighting there. He said that they were instructed not to fight; and, according to some with whom I have talked, who have come back and who are still alive, they have been used as guards. One young man was used as a guard for the National City Bank of the city of New York, which has just established a branch in Vladivostok. It occurred to me, on the bringing home of these dead heroes, men who have been sacrificed for our country, and, as I believe, without due process of law——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. On Calendar Wednesday, under the rules of the House, debate is confined to the subject matter of the bill under consideration. Because of the character of debate by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON], I feel constrained to ask that that rule be enforced; and I make the point of order that the gentleman is not confining his remarks to the subject of the bill under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct in his statement of the rule. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection to the gentleman's proceeding out of order if he does not denounce the Government of the United States just at this particular time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed in order.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, when it is brought to me so suddenly from a diplomatic source so reliable, I hardly know how to make applicable and germane the return of the dead soldiers from Russia to the discussion of a bill in respect to the price that we shall receive for certain dental tools. With all due respect, I desire to confine myself within the rules of the House, and I shall say no further upon the subject for the time being. I may be pardoned for saying, as I take my seat, that I had hoped to call the attention of the House, so that we would consider the duty of the Congress. I am not finding fault with any particular branch of the Government. I have my views as to what is right and what is constitutional. The gentleman from Texas probably has his. I think what I have discussed is a fair question for discussion on a military bill of any kind. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from California yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. I notice that this bill is confined to the sale of dental supplies.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is, supplies which dentists can purchase from the Government. Why should not medical and surgical supplies be included, so that the doctors and surgeons throughout the country can have the same privilege as the dentists?

Mr. KAHN. I understand that there has been no request made by the doctors for the sale of surgical supplies. The War Department has sent to the Committee on Military Affairs a bill asking that surplus medical supplies be turned over to the Red Cross.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does that include surgical instruments?

Mr. KAHN. I think it does. I dare say that if the doctors of the country had demanded legislation of this kind somebody would have introduced a bill, and it would have been considered.

Mr. KITCHIN. But perhaps they never thought about it. Perhaps they never thought that Congress would pass such a bill. Perhaps some smart, shrewd dentist was looking out for the dentists but not for the doctors.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON], who introduced this bill, is a doctor, and he introduced the bill for the dentists.

Mr. KITCHIN. Perhaps the dentists are stronger politically in Delaware than the doctors. [Laughter.] I have no objection to the bill; but I really wanted to know, because it struck me that both should have the same privilege.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I said that I would be very glad if we could amend this bill; and as I said in the few remarks I made I am going to introduce a bill covering all this vast material outside of mere dental outfits for the benefit of the health of the people of the United States first.

Mr. KITCHIN. Would it not be very easy for us to amend by including surgical instruments and surgical supplies?

Mr. KAHN. I will have to reserve a point of order on such an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call attention to the fact that the bill has not yet been read for amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the preamble and all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to sell at public or private sale, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, all dental supplies in excess of the needs of the Government, preferentially to persons who served in the Army of the United States during the recent war and who are at the time of such sale licensed to practice dentistry."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 13, after the word "authorized" insert the words "and directed."

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, if there is no objection to the amendment, I shall take no time.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, I shall not vote for the amendment, but I do not care to take up the time of the House with discussion of it.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to oppose the amendment; I think the committee did not——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. LAYTON. If the gentleman is going to oppose the amendment I would like to have the floor on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. QUIN. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAYTON. Let me get started, please.

Mr. QUIN. I am in favor of the gentleman's amendment, but I want to get at why the gentleman from New York objected. I guess I will have a little time later.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, my reason for opposing the amendment is this: Under the existing law certain preferences are created in favor of the War Department, the Marine Corps, and these others. Now, if you mix up that by giving the Secretary of War direction to sell these goods, I do not know what he would do. I do not think he would know what he would do, and I think you would create an obligation which would make it very difficult for him to handle the subject at all. That is the reason why I desire to authorize him to do it, and leave it to his judgment to accomplish what he has in his mind just as clearly as the gentleman has.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in rebuttal of that argument that this bill is so worded it is not taking any supplies needed for governmental purposes. It deals absolutely with the surplus for which there is no governmental use, and therefore I want the words "and directed" put in there for this reason. The word "authorization" is not "direction," so far as I have ever understood it. I might authorize a gentleman, or yield the floor for him to make a speech, but by authorizing him to do that I do not compel him to make a speech if he wants to sit down. And the Secretary of War has had this authorization under the general act, which I have here, for a year; at least he has it now—I do not know how long it has been—but he has not acted yet under that authorization. My desire is to make it mandatory, because I have information here, which I desire to put in the RECORD, showing the War Department has refused to sell these dental outfits either in whole or in part.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAYTON. In just a moment. I, as a Member of the House of Representatives, care nothing about who is Secretary of War; that does not enter into it; but as a Member of the House of Representatives I believe this body should begin to resume some of its constitutional powers and say so-and-so shall be done.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman know to what extent there is a surplus of these supplies on hand? What amount of supplies are on hand?

Mr. LAYTON. I stated that a moment ago, about 6,000 dental outfits. There were 5,000 enlisted dental officers, 86 when the war began and 5,000 at the armistice.

Mr. BRIGGS. These have been on hand for some time, have they not?

Mr. LAYTON. Ever since demobilization took place; yes. And there is a suspicion that the Government also has more dental outfits than that because they had contracts in excess of their needs at the time.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAYTON. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How long ago did the War Department arrive at the figures of the surplus? They must have begun some time ago to find out how many they had more than they needed?

Mr. LAYTON. This information which I have here of which I have spoken has been in my possession for two months.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman know the basis of the official determination of the department that that amount was actual surplus?

Mr. LAYTON. I got my information from the dental officer, the man in charge of one of the divisions.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Did he give to the gentleman the information in his official capacity as one giving information for the department?

Mr. LAYTON. He gave it to me in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware. I have had this matter called to my attention from time to time and have not been able to get any satisfaction out of the Surgeon General's office as to any policy that that office intended to pursue with reference to this particular matter. Now, everybody knows that if the Surgeon General's office during the war had sufficient dental equipment for the Army then in the service it has more now than it has any business with and ought to dispose of it. And we may assume it had sufficient for the service. If it did not, it was because it could not purchase sufficient, because it had plenty of appropriations and authorization, and I believe that this Congress ought to say to the Secretary of War, "You are not only authorized but you are directed to sell all dental supplies which are not needed for the service." Now, in doing that I make no reflection upon the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War, however, in technical matters, in matters of this kind, necessarily has to rely upon subordinates. He has to rely upon the dental officers, men in the Surgeon General's office, and all the information I have been able to get from the Surgeon General's office indicates, at least to my mind, that that office is in no hurry and did not care much about disposing of these dental instruments.

Mr. LAYTON. If the gentleman will permit, I think I have pretty good information that the reason these dental outfits have not been disposed of, although authorized, is because somewhere in the Government, I do not know where, there is a desire to turn this surplus over to the Public Health Service. Well, I do not believe in that. I think it ought to be turned over to the dentists throughout the whole country.

Mr. CONNALLY. Well, a sufficient argument in favor of this amendment is that the Secretary of War has had authority all along to dispose of these surplus supplies and has not done so.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. SANFORD. The Secretary of War has also had authority to turn over to the Public Health Service such of these items as he sees fit, but he has not had authority to sell other than by public bidding, and the purpose of this bill is merely to sell at private sale to these dental soldiers.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand that. My purpose in espousing the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware is not to give to the Secretary of War——

Mr. SANFORD. The gentleman would not approve selling at private sale to other than dental officers, would he?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the gentleman that under the language of the bill you give the Secretary of War practically carte blanche to do as he pleases, because you say "under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War."

Mr. SANFORD. That is dealing with a part of the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is dealing with the whole bill. You simply give the soldiers the preference, but you are authorizing the Secretary to sell these supplies to anybody under such rules and regulations as he may make.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Do you have any information as to what the reason is that the Secretary of War refused to sell, as was inferred by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON]?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have no information other than that I suppose that the Secretary of War was advised by somebody in the Surgeon General's office that it had not completed an investigation as to whether or not these supplies are needed by the Army.

The following letter from the Surgeon General's office may throw some light on the subject:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, September 20, 1919.

Hon. TOM CONNALLY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONNALLY: Replying further to your letter of August 22, transmitting letter from J. M. Murphy, D. D. S., Temple, Tex., relative to dental outfits, report that investigation by this office has failed to elicit the whereabouts of dental outfits in excess of the requirements of the Army on a peace-time basis.

If universal training is to be decided upon, a large number of outfits will be required, and they will be in constant use, taking care of the young men who will be called to the colors for training. It will probably be the policy of the War Department to remedy dental defects, in so far as practicable, during the period of training. At any rate, all emergency work will be promptly and properly performed, and to do this will require the large number of outfits indicated.

A large number of outfits were purchased. A large number were sent overseas, together with large quantities of dental instruments. Some of these are being returned; others, it is believed, have been sold to the French Government. It will probably be several months before the stock which is being returned from France can be properly assorted, classified, repaired, and made available for issue or for sale.

It is possible that the Director of Purchase and Storage under whose jurisdiction this property now is, may be able to furnish you further information, although in the present state of records and methods in that office this is very doubtful.

Regretting that I can not furnish you any more definite information, I am,

Very sincerely, yours,

EDWIN P. WOLFE,
Colonel, Medical Corps.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will.

Mr. CALDWELL. The proposition is this, that under the law, if they sell these instruments or supplies under the authority that they now have, they must publish and sell them to the highest bidder and in open competition. The idea of this bill is to give those men who sold their instruments to the Government when we needed them and could not buy them from the factories an opportunity to get privately and make a bargain over the counter for such of the supplies as they want and give them the preference in the purchase.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I would follow the first amendment, when it is disposed of, with another.

Mr. CALDWELL. We have not disposed of this. The gentleman is asking for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order.

Mr. CALDWELL. I rise to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Have I not the right under the rules of this House to oppose the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That would be an amendment in the third degree at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Is it not a rule of this House that when an amendment is offered one person opposed to the amendment is entitled to five minutes in opposition to it?

The CHAIRMAN. The understanding is that when a gentleman moves an amendment he has five minutes in which to favor his amendment, and any person who rises in opposition may have five minutes. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] rose, and the Chair had no idea whether he was in favor of or opposed to the amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will recall—and he can get the Reporter to read it to him—when the gentleman from Texas rose he announced he was in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] will be recognized for five minutes in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Have I answered the gentleman's question?

This is not a case where the Secretary of War or the War Department has hoarded anything that ought to be sold. It is a case where the War Department is asking leave to cut the red tape in order that the men who are really entitled to a preference in the purchase of these things may have an opportunity to do so. These men gave their services and time and energies to the Nation in the time of her greatest need, and there is no reason why they should not have this preference.

Mr. SANFORD. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] told the committee that in his opinion these sales could be made to anybody. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this permits sales to soldier dentists, and to nobody else. You can not read a part of this sentence and draw from it an inference of general authority. The only authority given to the Secretary of War is to sell to soldier dentists, and to nobody else; and he not only must sell to them, but sell to them preferentially.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will ask the gentleman from New York, then, what is the use of the word "preferentially"? It means he has authority to sell to anybody, but preferentially to soldiers.

Mr. SANFORD. That would be so if it said so.

Mr. CONNALLY. What is the use of using the word "preferentially"?

Mr. SANFORD. There is not much use. It is merely a description and is opposed to a surplus.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. JONES of Texas. What is the gentleman's objection to the amendment if the purpose is to sell these and to direct the Secretary to sell them? How would that interfere in any way?

Mr. CALDWELL. We believe there ought to be a certain amount of discretion in the matter, and I do not think we ought to tie the Secretary's hands when he asks the privilege of cutting red tape.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. LAYTON) there were—ayes 31, noes 29.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAYTON: Page 2, line 14, after the word "prescribe," insert the words: "at a price not to exceed the original cost to the Government."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that there is some error in the gentleman's reference. The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] will give heed. The Clerk informs the Chair that the gentleman's reference to the line is an incorrect one.

Mr. LAYTON. It is line 15, page 2, after the word "prescribe."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAYTON: Page 2, line 15, after the word "prescribe," insert the words: "at a price not to exceed the original cost to the Government."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman modify his amendment so that it will read "at the price paid by the Government"?

Mr. LAYTON. I accept that.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me better. Otherwise they might sell it for nothing.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman's suggestion is acceptable.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the modified amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 15, after the word "prescribe," insert "at the price paid by the Government."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the gentleman's amendment?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the modified amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I have the floor. I submit, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, that this bill is for the soldier boy, and that it is perfectly right; and more than that, it is patriotic. It is a little recognition of men who left their offices and left their practice and sold their outfits, and who now stand to pay over 300 per cent more in order to resume their vocation. I am only asking that the Government sell those outfits at the price it paid for them. Certainly the Government does not want to put itself in the position of trying to make a profit at the expense of the men who sacrificed themselves in this struggle.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. Does the gentleman realize that the Government may have paid a very high price for these things in an emergency, and that they ought to sell now for very much less to these officers? The gentleman's amendment would prohibit that.

Mr. LAYTON. If they sell those outfits to dental officers at the price that the Government paid for them in the beginning, I have the assurance that the dental officers who came to me with their petitions will be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. But the prices have been advanced.

Mr. LAYTON. Yes; I understand that prices have been advanced over 300 per cent.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PARRISH. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON], I would like to know if a substitute for his amendment will be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment by way of a substitute will.

Mr. PARRISH. Then I move to substitute in lieu of his amendment this: "at a price not less than the amount paid by the Government."

Mr. LAYTON. I accept that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PARRISH. "At the price paid by the Government."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARRISH as a substitute to the amendment offered by Mr. LAYTON: Page 2, line 15, after the word "prescribe," insert "at a price not less than the price paid by the Government."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Delaware wish to withdraw his amendment and accept this one?

Mr. LAYTON. No.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a very short word in favor of leaving discretion in the hands of the Secretary of War in this matter. The Government has been fortunate enough to sell very few things that it bought during the war at the price it paid. I think instances are very rare where they were sold for cost. The Government should not expect to sell at cost to these soldiers. At any rate, that is a matter to be left to the judgment of the Secretary of War. We have not before us sufficient facts to justify us in saying how he should sell or at what price he should sell. I think we can safely leave the matter in the hands of the administrative officer, where it belongs. If he could succeed in selling for 80 or 90 per cent of the cost he would be doing well.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. OLNEY. It may be that some of these instruments have been used. They may be secondhand now.

Mr. SANFORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts is right. Many of these instruments may have been used. It is the notion of the committee that the soldier citizen should get a very fair advantage here, but just what advantage he will get I do not know.

Mr. EMERSON. Is it the intention of the department to ask the same price for the new and for the secondhand?

Mr. SANFORD. I do not know as to that. Probably the Secretary would make a fixed price for standard articles and let the dentists know that they can be had at that price.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], a member of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my substitute amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his substitute amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask one question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] has the floor. Does he yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Leaving the language as it is, if these supplies are sold they will be sold at a fair market value, will they not?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. It would permit the Secretary of War or any Government agent to sell at a fair market price?

Mr. SANFORD. I think so.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I understand the purpose of this bill is to give the benefit to the dentist who went into the Army. Is that right?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I ask a careful reading of lines 16, 17, and 18 to see if we do that or not:

Preferentially to persons who served in the Army of the United States during the recent war and who are at the time of such sale licensed to practice dentistry.

Suppose a man were licensed to practice dentistry on the 1st of last January and he was not a dentist at the time he was in the Army, but became one afterwards?

Mr. SANFORD. I think it would apply to him.

Mr. BEE. I have heard the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] say these men had given up their offices and had gone into the Army, and now they would have to pay more for these instruments.

Mr. SANFORD. It includes those who are in the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. STEENERSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to make a pro forma amendment in order to ask a question or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEENERSON: At the end of the committee amendment insert "Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to dispose of said supplies at as early a date as possible in accordance with this resolution and the provisions of law applicable thereto."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think a point of order is involved. This amendment authorizes the Secretary of War to sell at public or private sale, but it does not say when he shall do it, and this proviso simply adds that he shall do it at as early a date as practicable, in accordance with the provisions of the resolution, so that it can not be delayed indefinitely.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. In a minute. The grievance that we have against the War Department is that they do not take action. They delay and keep these supplies on hand indefinitely until they deteriorate. There is nothing in this committee amendment that will make them act speedily, whereas my amendment simply says that they must do it at as early a date as practicable in compliance with the provisions of the resolution and the provisions of law applicable to such sale. That covers the case of the Marine Corps and the Red Cross, the provisions of existing law which have been referred to.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman's amendment contains the words "as early as practicable," does it not?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And it leaves the War Department to determine how early that shall be?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then what have you gained by adding those words?

Mr. STEENERSON. I have simply indicated that it is the desire of Congress to have speedy action. We have passed a resolution with reference to other supplies, and when we indicated that we wanted early action taken in regard to food supplies that had been on hand for months and were deteriorating, the War Department, in compliance with our action, put those food supplies on sale at once. If we indicate as a part of this committee amendment that we want early action, I believe it will influence the department to proceed to dispose of these things earlier than it would otherwise.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I admire the gentleman's faith.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California withdraw his point of order?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have some information about this whole matter. First I should like to know what these 6,000 sets of dental instruments are worth. Does anybody know? I am asking about the sets of dental instruments, not the dental supplies.

Mr. KAHN. I do not know. Dr. LAYTON, who introduced the resolution, probably knows what these outfits are worth.

Mr. LAYTON. The average cost to the Government of these 6,000 outfits, at $1,500 apiece, is $9,000,000.

Mr. KEARNS. Fifteen hundred dollars a set?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. Now, does anybody know what the supplies are worth? Does anybody know how much gold and how much platinum the Government has on hand in the form of dental supplies?

Mr. LAYTON. If the gentleman will excuse me, this bill has nothing at all to do with dental supplies. It is only dealing with dental outfits.

Mr. CANNON. The word "supplies" appears at line 15 in the amendment.

Here are $9,000,000 worth of instruments that the Government owns, and that I apprehend it is not using. Now, somebody suggests that they are to go to the Red Cross. Can they go to the Red Cross under existing legislation? Who knows?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The Government could turn over the $9,000,000 worth of these dental outfits to the Red Cross?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Can these instruments be transferred to the Public Health Service under existing law?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Now, is there $9,000,000 or $19,000,000 or $29,000,000 worth of dental supplies besides the instruments? I do not know how many dentists there were in the service. Who does know?

Mr. LAYTON. There were 5,000.

Mr. CANNON. Five thousand went in, and they received the pay and they got their commissions. You say they sold their instruments. What did they get for them? I do not know. Who does know? We are spending the money and wasting the supplies that the Government does not need, and doing it like drunken sailors. I do not know whether the Committee on Military Affairs had knowledge or not, but if the Army has the power to turn over $9,000,000 worth of supplies to the Red Cross, presumably to go abroad, or to the Public Health Service, which spreads all over the country, to treat not only the servants of the Government but to treat people in civil life, I wish somebody who had the knowledge would give some information and offer some legislation that will enable the Government to realize on the supplies that it does not need.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. All time has expired on this amendment.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. This bill does not give anything to anybody. It provides for the sale of dental outfits and dental supplies, and, of course, it is reasonable to suppose that the department will sell them for the price that they cost the Government, or as near that price as it can.

Mr. LAYTON. In other words, this bill proposes to recoup the Government $9,000,000?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. If the facts here stated are correct, that these outfits are 6,000 in number and cost $1,500 apiece, and this bill requires that they shall be sold at somewhere near what they cost the Government.

Mr. SANFORD. And give the soldiers the benefit of the opportunity.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask another question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for how long?

Mr. CANNON. Five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Is there any danger of these supplies and other supplies being turned over to somebody else that we do not know anything about?

Mr. KAHN. Not under this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Does the committee anticipate reporting a bill providing that these supplies that are not needed by the Government shall be sold and the money covered into the Treasury?

Mr. SANFORD. That is what this bill does.

Mr. CANNON. That is as to these dental supplies?

Mr. KAHN. Well, Mr. Chairman, the surplus Government war supplies are being sold every day. They have a sales department up in the War Office, and they are selling off the surplus of their supplies every day of the week except Sunday, and I do not know but what they are doing business on Sunday. They are trying to get rid of these supplies by sale.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I would like to ask the chairman whether he knows anything about the $100,000,000 worth of medical supplies that were given away by the War Department?

Mr. KAHN. They were given to the Red Cross under an act passed by Congress, and those supplies were in Europe; they were not supplies in this country.

Mr. BEE. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON. When were they given away?

Mr. KAHN. As I recollect we passed a law on the subject——

Mr. CANNON. Since the armistice?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. BEE. The gentleman from New York is not discussing anything before the House, but is making a partisan statement under the guise of speaking to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all debate has been exhausted, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 16, strike out the word "preferentially" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "first giving preference." After line 18 strike out the period, add a comma and the following: "and thereafter to other persons who are licensed dentists."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I am prompted to offer this amendment by the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] a little while ago that the only purpose of the bill was to authorize the sale of dental outfits to those who had been in the Army. As a matter of fact, I do not believe the language of the bill is susceptible of any such construction. But assuming that the gentleman from New York speaks with authority, being a member of the committee, I think the House ought to make it entirely clear what the House means by this measure.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will.

Mr. SANFORD. Does the gentleman think that the War Department ought to sell at private sale?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; I do, under proper regulations. I think the Secretary of War ought to be authorized to make sales to private persons under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of War is authorized to make in the bill. The Secretary could classify the instruments by regulation. He could put a standard price on the different articles and different pieces of equipment and let anybody who is a dentist purchase these articles from the War Department.

Referring to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] about the Government getting a fair price, allow me to say if the War Department sells these sets of equipment to dentists, to individual dentists, there will be no trouble in getting somewhere in the neighborhood of what the equipment is really worth. It is only when the Government or anybody else undertakes to sell a great bulk of goods to some dealer, who expects to turn around and retail the articles at an enormous profit, that the Government gets the worst of the sale.

I believe that not only dentists who have been in the Army, but civilian dentists, should have the right to purchase these supplies after those who were in the Army are supplied. We are not legislating alone for dentists who happened to be in the Army, but for the people of the United States, for civilians who need the outfits. Why should they not be allowed to go to the Government and buy surplus outfits over and above those needed for the Army and those officers discharged?

The Surgeon General does not seem to be excited about this. The letter, dated September 20, already placed in the RECORD, discloses that fact.

That was one reason why I favored the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware, because the Surgeon General's Office, according to the letter, has got to speculate on what Congress is going to do as to universal training or other action that we may take, saying that in view of what may happen it has no surplus supplies that it could dispose of.

So if the bill is so restricted, as the gentleman from New York says, the amendment should be adopted in order that preference shall be given to those who were in the Army and then to those who have a dental certificate, and then, if any equipment is left, to sell it to the trade. I want to say that the trade does not want the instruments sold. The wholesale dealers have sold to the Government all the available instruments and supplies at enormous prices, and they do not want them turned back, especially into private hands. If they are to be turned back at all, they would prefer that they should be turned over to the jobbers, who would save the Government the trouble of retailing them and, incidentally, collect an enormous profit. [Applause.]

Mr. LAYTON. I only asked the gentleman to yield the floor to me for the purpose of getting into the RECORD a report of the Federal Trade Commission on the very subject he is speaking about.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, the gentleman can put that in later. He can ask leave to extend his remarks. I have not seen it, and I would not care to take the responsibility for it.

Mr. LAYTON. I am so doubtful as to what extending remarks means and how far I can go within the last two weeks——

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, the gentleman can put that in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. The practice on the gentleman's side of the House is such that he can get that in, I am sure.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be frank and to say to the committee that it was and is my intention now that the provision of the committee amendment limit the Secretary of War, in making private sales, to selling only to soldier dentists. That, in my opinion, was the purpose of the committee and is the purpose of the amendment. I can not agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] that the Secretary of War ought to be authorized or encouraged to sell millions of dollars worth of surplus property by private sale. I can not approve of that. I do not approve of that policy, for I feel that all surplus property that is sold should be sold at the earliest possible moment, and that all public property, with these few exceptions, as in the case of these soldier dentists, should be sold at public sale, after due advertisement, and that all dealers and all citizens who contributed to the purchase of the property—and they all did contribute—should have an equal chance now to buy.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SANFORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that food supplies are being sold by the War Department all over the country now at private sale. The gentleman approves of that, does he not? The gentleman from New York voted for that, did he not?

Mr. SANFORD. I hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. JONES of Texas rose.

Mr. SANFORD. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. CONNALLY. But the gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. SANFORD. I will answer it in a moment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I would ask the gentleman if he does not think the language of this amendment is clear, that they can sell to anyone, but preferentially to persons who served in the United States Army.

Mr. SANFORD. Whether there is any doubt about the meaning of the committee amendment, there is no doubt about my purpose. I would not authorize the War Department to sell these millions of dollars of public property at private sale. Not only would I not direct it but I would not authorize it. I disagree with persons who have that purpose in mind.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. No; because I find there is no purpose in yielding, as I have such a short time anyway that I can not make myself clear in the time I have.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. No. In answer to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] as to whether we are selling perishable foodstuffs at private sale, I can not say. I have no knowledge and I care for no knowledge on that subject. Of course, the Government should sell perishable foodstuffs or other foodstuffs if it wants to to all of the people in a manner that is understood by all of the people; but here is a matter where you have millions of dollars' worth of technical property desired by the profession and by the trade; and I think, with the exception that the committee amendment has in view, that this stuff should be sold only at public sale, and I think we will make a mistake when we go beyond that.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HUSTED. Has the Secretary of War unrestricted rights under existing law to sell these goods at public auction now?

Mr. SANFORD. It is my understanding that he has absolute right to sell all of this surplus material at public auction.

Mr. KAHN. And he is doing it every day.

Mr. SANFORD. And he is doing it as rapidly as he can. I think it is a good thing that he did not do it in this specific case until this matter was considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rose to a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. What is the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], and the question is on that amendment.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two lines.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order at this time. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I have sent to the desk, which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 2, line 15, after the word "supplies," insert "and surgical instruments."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman reserve it just a moment?

Mr. KAHN. That it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I admit, Mr. Chairman, it is subject to a point of order, because the entire bill is for disposition of surplus dental outfits. Well, my two friends from Texas suggest that it is not subject to a point of order because surgical instruments apply to dental supplies and are a part——

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. For a question.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman's contention is that they should be permitted to sell surgical instruments that might be used in conducting operations for appendicitis to the dentists——

Mr. KITCHIN. I have another amendment, if the gentleman will just wait. Of course, if this amendment is not subject to the point of order and should pass, then I desire to offer the following amendment: Strike out the period in line 18 and add "or medicine or surgery," so it would apply to surgeons and doctors and dentists and surgical instruments. I said a while ago I thought it might be subject to a point of order, according to the ruling of the distinguished chairman on certain other occasions with respect to bills, which I thought then was an erroneous ruling; but to be consistent, if a point of order is insisted on, I think the Chair would have to sustain it.

Mr. KAHN. I would say frankly—will the gentleman yield for a minute?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. KAHN. I have no objection to that kind of legislation, properly worded and properly introduced. If the gentleman is willing to introduce a bill of that kind, I will promise him we will try to get early action on it and report it out.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think all gentlemen can agree on this. If you will notice, my amendment does not interfere with medical supplies. It is only surgical instruments, and I have looked it over very carefully, and with the amendment I suggested I will offer if this should pass it simply gives the doctors and surgeons the identical privilege which you say you are willing to give to dentists. If doctors have left their offices and have gone to the Army under the same circumstances as the dentists, why should we not give them the right to purchase from the War Department the surgical instruments they may want to use just as the dentists?

Mr. LAYTON. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. I have no interest in this bill at all, though I introduced it in the beginning, because of the fact I see very plainly that this bill is not going to do the soldier dentists one particle of good. You are going to sell at public sale, and the combined dental manufacturers of the country will buy the whole shooting match and then charge what they please.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is mistaken; it is at public or private sale.

Mr. LAYTON. I thought your amendment——

Mr. KITCHIN. No; that is in the committee amendment.

Mr. LAYTON. How are they going to secure a private sale unless they advertise?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; "the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to sell at public or private sale under such rules and regulations," and so forth.

Mr. LAYTON. Individually?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. That covers the gentleman's case.

Mr. LAYTON. Then I will take it back.

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not see, to save my life, why the doctors, surgeons, and dentists of the country should not be treated alike when——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is not confining himself to the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no point of order made, the gentleman reserved the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is discussing his amendment under the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I assume the point of order is to be made, therefore I do not quite understand the object of taking up the time of the committee in discussing the merits of a matter that will not be considered.

Mr. KITCHIN. Just let me finish this.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is entirely proper for the Committee on Military Affairs to take up this very matter——

Mr. KITCHIN. Would the majority leader permit me to give him one good Republican reason why surgical instruments for doctors should be left out of this bill, to be consistent with other legislation which you passed? That is all I wanted to say now, if you will permit me, the only Republican reason that can be given.

Mr. MONDELL. There is reason why everything should be left out of the bill except what is provided for.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. I admit according to the Chair's ruling heretofore on bills of this kind it is subject to the point of order, but I thought I could reason with the gentlemen and get them to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment as amended. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL] has sent an amendment to the Clerk's desk of which the Chair did not know. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PELL: Page 2, line 16, after the word "Army," insert the words "Navy, Marine Corps, and Red Cross."

Mr. SANFORD. We approve of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. EMERSON: Page 2, line 18, after the word "dentistry," insert "but not more than one set of dental supplies shall be sold at private sale to any one person."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. There has been an amendment already adopted and agreed to by the committee adding some words at the end of the resolution, and the gentleman's amendment should be offered at the end of the resolution and not at the specific place mentioned in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed there has been no amendment offered at the end of the resolution.

Mr. PADGETT. Was not the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL] at the end?

The CHAIRMAN. It was not.

Mr. EMERSON. I ask for a vote on my amendment. I do not care to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PELL and Mr. HICKS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] is recognized.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS], offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HICKS: After the words "Marine Corps," in Mr. PELL'S amendment, add the words "Coast Guard."

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that is to make it entirely uniform.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman know whether any dentists in the Coast Guard went into the service?

Mr. HICKS. The purpose of my amendment is to make the various branches of the service uniform. We have included the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL] as to the Marine Corps and the Navy, and this is merely another branch of the service—the Coast Guard.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL] to this—although it is merely a technical matter, but it might be important in pursuing this amendment—that his amendment provides for the "Red Cross." The name is "American Red Cross," and the amendment ought to be corrected.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the organization may be changed in my amendment to "the American Red Cross."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the name may be changed to "the American Red Cross." Is there objection?

Mr. PELL. And following that it may be changed to read:

The American Red Cross and Public Health Service.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield? I did not realize it included the words "Red Cross." The Red Cross is already provided for by law and can receive these things as gifts. I thought the gentleman said "Marine Corps."

Mr. PELL. Only the men who served in these bodies—in the organizations themselves.

Mr. SANFORD. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CONNALLY: Page 2, line 16, strike out the word "preferentially"; in line 18 strike out the period and insert a comma, and add the following: "and to other persons licensed to practice dentistry. Provided, That after the offer of sale of such dental supplies to persons licensed to practice dentistry, any surplus dental supplies remaining may be sold at public sale to the public or the trade."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LAYTON. On page 2, line 15, strike out the word "supplies" and insert the word "outfits."

Mr. SANFORD. We agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAYTON: Page 2, line 15, strike out the word "supplies" and insert in lieu thereof the word "outfits."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. How will the bill as amended, including the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON], now read?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask that it be reported?

Mr. WALSH. The Emerson proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the committee amendment as amended will now be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to sell at public or private sale, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, all dental outfits in excess of the needs of the Government, preferentially to persons who served in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, the American Red Cross, and Coast Guard of the United States during the recent war, and who were at the time of such sale licensed to practice dentistry, but not more than one set of dental supplies shall be sold at private sale to any one person."

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I think that inasmuch as the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has cut out the word "supplies" elsewhere in the resolution, it ought to cut out the word "supplies" there and insert the word "outfits."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Delaware offer an amendment to that effect?

Mr. CALDWELL. Will not the gentleman ask unanimous consent that that be stricken out?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes; I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent that the word "supplies" be stricken out and that the word "outfits" be inserted in lieu thereof. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, would it not be possible that some dentist might want to buy a partial outfit, and not an entire outfit, as signified by the amendment?

Mr. LAYTON. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that there is a vast difference between a dental "outfit" and "supplies." Supplies are changeable things.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What does the gentleman mean by a dental "outfit"?

Mr. LAYTON. A dental outfit consists of a dental engine and a chair and all sorts of instruments for filling teeth and pulling teeth, and it includes amalgams and fillings and other things known as "supplies."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under that a man could not buy a part of an outfit without buying a whole outfit. I just wanted to raise that question, Mr. Chairman, because some impoverished dentist under existing conditions that we are seeking to correct might desire simply to buy a dental chair, or a single set of dental instruments, or something of that kind.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. If the word "outfits" was inserted in lieu of the word "supplies," possibly only supplies could not be bought. This would enable the dentist to buy only an outfit. It occurs to me we ought to permit these sales of supplies also.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think so. That is why I raised the question. Under the circumstances I object to unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Delaware move to strike out "supplies" and insert "outfits"? What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. LAYTON. I move to strike out the word "supplies" and insert the word "outfits."

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order against that amendment. Let us have the amendment again reported. I want to make the point of order against it when the amendment is reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LAYTON moves to strike out the word "supplies" in the Emerson amendment and insert in lieu thereof the word "outfits."

Mr. WALSH. I make a point of order against that. This language has already been inserted in the bill, and the committee passed on to other amendments. It is not in order now to return to that and move to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 9.

So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the resolution back to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the resolution as amended be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that the committee do now rise and report back the resolution to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the resolution as amended be passed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration House joint resolution 222, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the resolution as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution as amended.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to report the same back forthwith with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to report the same back forthwith with an amendment. The Clerk will report the gentleman's motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONNALLY moves to recommit the House joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith, with the following amendment: Page 2, line 16, strike out the word "preferentially" and insert in lieu thereof the words "first giving preference," and after line 18 strike out the period, add a comma and the following: "and thereafter to other persons who are licensed dentists."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. CONNALLY. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 49.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended in accordance with the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the Calendar Wednesday rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further proceedings under Calendar Wednesday rule.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALSH. If the Chair will permit, I think the RECORD should show that in the judgment of the Chair two-thirds voted in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thanks the gentleman for the suggestion. Two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, further proceedings under the Calendar Wednesday rule are dispensed with.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Monday, the Unanimous Consent Calendar and suspension of the rules, may be in order during the remainder of the day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the balance of the day be devoted to business in order on Monday last. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman have any intention of calling up anything where there is a proposition to suspend the rules?

Mr. BUTLER. There is one motion to suspend the rules on which the vote was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

CERTAIN ALLOWANCES TO OFFICERS OF THE NAVY.

The SPEAKER. On last suspension day the House had reached the stage of voting upon a joint resolution from the Naval Committee, which the Chair will ask the Clerk to report.

The Clerk read the title of House joint resolution 213, continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, let the joint resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas since it now appears that peace will not have been declared by October 1, 1919, on which date officers of the Navy, by operation of law, will cease to receive the benefits prescribed in the act of April 16, 1918 (Public, No. 129).

Whereas said benefits will accrue to officers of the Army until peace shall have been declared: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the paragraph in the act of July 11, 1919 (Public, No. 8), which reads as follows:

"The act of April 16, 1918 (Public, No. 129), granting under certain conditions to every commissioned officer of the Army the right to quarters in kind for their dependents or the authorized commutation therefor, including the allowances for heat and light, shall hereafter be construed to apply to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps only during the period of the war and in no event beyond October 1, 1919," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] procured unanimous consent to take up business upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair thinks he asked for the consideration of business that was in order on Monday, unanimous-consent day.

Mr. WALSH. I misunderstood the gentleman's request.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Speaker, there is no class in this country which deserves better treatment from the Government than the officers of the Navy. They are now far above the average in capacity and in intelligence, inspired by a spirit and loyalty that should be a model for all citizens. Their duty involves unflagging vigilance, arduous training, and great responsibility.

It is becoming a growing scandal that the men on whose efficiency we all rely in time of danger should be reduced almost to penury, and in many cases, at least, be forced to deny themselves all but the simplest pleasures and comforts.

The patriotic devotion of our naval officers has always been a great glory of this country; I sincerely hope that their martyrdom will not become our disgrace. We can not give them what they are worth; let us at least give them what they need.

Mr. KRAUS. By direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I request that Senate joint resolution 112 be substituted for the pending joint resolution, it having passed the Senate and being on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution 112, which has passed the Senate, be taken from the Speaker's table and substituted for the resolution pending. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question being taken, on a division there were—ayes 65, noes 6.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees. As many as are in favor of the passage of the joint resolution will, when their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 228, nays 4, answered "present" 2, not voting 198, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

RETURN OF THE BODIES OF DEAD SOLDIERS.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House concurrent resolution 36.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

House concurrent resolution 36.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the steamship Lake Daraga is expected to arrive in New York on or about November 9, bearing the first bodies of American soldiers from the fields of the World War; and

Whereas it is proper and fitting that due recognition be given to the return to our shores of the mortal remains of those men who gave their lives for the cause of freedom: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a committee of six Members of the House of Representatives, to be selected by the Speaker, and six Members of the Senate, to be selected by the President of the Senate, be appointed to represent the Congress at such appropriate ceremonies at the port of New York as may be determined upon as proper and appropriate.

That the expenses of the said committee and of the ceremonies arranged by it shall be paid one-half out of the contingent fund of the House and one-half out of the contingent fund of the Senate, on vouchers to be signed by the chairmen of the House and Senate committees, respectively.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Reserving the right to object, let me ask the gentleman, is it the thought that this shall become a regular function?

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. No; the resolution states that these are the first bodies officially to be returned to this country.

Mr. GARRETT. I understand that. Is it the gentleman's thought that we shall continue this thing in the future; and if not, why not?

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. My thought is this, I will say to the gentleman, that this country should not allow the dead to be dumped on the dock in New York City or anywhere else unnoticed.

Mr. GARRETT. But that will be true of those returned in the future.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. It is particularly true of the first bodies to be brought home.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that when the first bodies that were brought home dead from the Mexican expedition the President of the United States went to New York and headed the committee that held the ceremonies there. If that was proper then it is certainly proper now. I hope nobody in the House will object.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. I take it that this was the thought of my colleague that inasmuch as it would not be possible for a committee of Congress to meet each ship that might return with our dead from abroad, the feeling was that there should be some recognition by Congress of the return of these dead heroes from over the seas and that the proper time for Congress to arrange exercises and for Congress on behalf of the country to pay homage would be now when the first ship does arrive. I take it that this was the thought of my colleague, which, I am sure, we all share.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How many bodies are coming and from what country are they from?

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I am informed by the War Department that there are 111 bodies from North Russia—dead American soldiers.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This is the return of 111 bodies from Russia when we know that there are about 75,000 of them in France yet to be returned, and whose return we know not whether it will ever be consummated. Does the gentleman believe that these dead soldiers, were they alive, or their families now, would want Congress to spend a great amount of money on a junketing trip at this particular time on this particular occasion?

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Does the gentleman want an answer?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I do not think the gentleman means to use the expression "junketing trip" on an occasion of this kind.

Mr. BLANTON. We have had junketing trips at funerals.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. If the gentleman feels that the war was a junket, he is entitled to that opinion.

Mr. BLANTON. But the war is now over.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. And the dead are coming home.

Mr. BLANTON. I would be in favor of doing something to bring the dead in France back home.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. That has nothing to do with this. This is consummated.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 183) providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries of lands within the former Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection I made a moment ago.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill just reported go over for the day, retaining its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

RETURN OF BODIES OF AMERICAN SOLDIERS.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of House concurrent resolution 36?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry. Was it not the purpose of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to take up the Calendar for Unanimous Consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair had directed the calling of the first bill upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, and at the request of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS] the bill first called was ordered to go over without prejudice. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has this resolution been referred to a committee and acted upon by it?

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. It has not.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask the House to indulge me for a few brief words. The resolution which I offer proposes to recognize one of the most solemn occasions in the history of this country. Within a few days a boat will arrive in New York laden with over 100 of the bodies of dead American soldiers who gave up their lives in the greatest of all wars. These are the first of the Nation's dead in that Great War to be brought home. We have acclaimed and received with triumphant marches and joyous celebrations the return to our bosom of the living heroes of that war. I believe we should now reverently and humbly honor our dead. [Applause.] I have only this to add, that these dead, too, won the war.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Speaker, it is only right and fitting that the Congress of the United States should do honor to these dead. They are the first of a great number to be returned to lie in the land they died to save. This is a proper time for us to show our respect, our sorrow, and our pride.

The landing of these bodies should be the occasion of a solemn searching of hearts by all Americans. We must keep this country for which they died worthy of their sacrifice and ourselves hold cheap the rewards of wealth or political place in the cause for which these boys gave their lives.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon the resolution just agreed to and upon the naval bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TITLE TO CERTAIN HOMESTEAD LANDS IN HAWAII.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 546) to authorize the governor of the Territory of Hawaii to ratify the agreements of certain persons made with the commissioner of public lands of the Territory of Hawaii and to issue land patents to those eligible under the terms of said agreements.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WATSON] how many tracts of land and how many people are affected by this legislation?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the total acreage involved in this bill comprises some 524 acres, in perhaps 33 different tracts or parcels. There are 26 individuals interested in these land titles. The trouble has arisen here on account of a mistake made by the land commissioner in the Territory of Hawaii. These 26 individuals some years ago were permitted to apply for and to hold and take possession of these tracts of land. After they had occupied these tracts of land, on account of the mistake of the law, because of the land commissioner of the Territory, they were permitted to withdraw their application for these several parcels that they had so taken up and to apply for other tracts of land. The act of Congress of 1908, I think, and 1910 provided that no one who had once applied for and taken up a tract of land should be permitted to apply for or take up another tract or to have a patent issued to him for another tract. The land officer of the Territory allowed this to be done on the part of each individual because of his ignorance of the act of Congress relating to that subject. Of these 26 people, 6 have complied with all the provisions of the statute and have taken possession of and occupied the land in question and have had the patents actually issued to them. Two of them have complied with all of the provisions of the law and are entitled to have patents issued to them. The remainder, 18 in number, are in different stages of having complied with the law on the subject, and perhaps by this time most of them have complied with all of the legal requirements.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Of course these persons acquired this land contrary to the provisions of law, did they not?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. In the first instance, they did not. When they exchanged the land they had in the first instance and were permitted to take up other tracts of land, by the advice and consent of the land commissioner of the Territory, they were acting ultra vires.

Now, there is no question, I will say to the gentleman, as to the good faith of these individuals; there is no question as to the mistake of the law certified by the local land commissioner.

Mr. WALSH. Well, was it not more than a mistake on the part of the local land commissioner?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. There is no evidence in the case, I will say to the gentleman, that there was anything but a mistake of law committed by the land commissioner. From reading the act of Congress I do not see how he could have very well committed the mistake, but if you take the act of Congress now and undertake to construe it in the light of what has transpired in these cases, I think the gentleman, like myself, would reach the conclusion that the local land officer made a mistake in the law on this subject of the exchange of one body of land for others. The question of the bona fide of the transaction is beyond dispute. I want to say to the gentleman further that this bill, or an identical bill, passed the Senate in the last Congress, was reported favorably from a committee of this House, and was ready to be passed in this House just before we adjourned at the last session. The Territorial Legislature for Hawaii has asked for the passage of this legislation. The governor of the Territory has memoralized Congress asking that this be passed. The Secretary of the Interior has asked that it be passed, and I am satisfied there is no harm done to anyone, and that these people are entitled to relief. I hope the gentleman will raise no objection.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 546) to authorize the governor of the Territory of Hawaii to ratify the agreements of certain persons made with the commissioner of public lands of the Territory of Hawaii, and to issue land patents to those eligible under the terms of said agreements.

Be it enacted, etc., That the governor of the Territory of Hawaii is hereby authorized and directed to ratify and carry into effect the agreements made by the commissioner of public lands of the Territory of Hawaii with certain homesteaders, referred to in the resolution adopted by the senate and house of representatives of the Territory of Hawaii, April 26, 1917; also to issue land patents to those living up to the terms of the agreements when same have been completed; also to issue land patents to those who have already complied with all the terms of their agreements, and to ratify and confirm the land patents already issued to homesteaders in accordance with the provisions of the resolution of the senate and house of representatives, Territory of Hawaii, of April 26, 1917, above mentioned.

SEC. 2. The governor shall report to the Secretary of the Interior the action taken by him hereunder.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WATSON of Virginia, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—HARRY GRAHAM.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

I return herewith without my approval H. R. 8272, entitled "An act to restore Harry Graham, captain of Infantry, to his former position on lineal list of captains of Infantry." I am constrained to take this action for the reasons set forth in the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
5 November, 1919.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, is there any objection to having the letter read?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I think the letter is part of the veto message.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to refer the veto message to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the President gives as his reasons for his veto the accompanying letter. The letter accompanies the message and manifestly it is part of the veto, and I think the House should have the benefit of it.

The SPEAKER. If the House wants it, of course, it will undoubtedly give unanimous consent to have the letter read, but the Chair does not think it is. I think the gentleman will recall that very often documents are sent down——

Mr. WINGO. That is where the accompanying documents do not go to the substance of the proposition. But here the President gives his reasons set out in the letter and the House will have no knowledge of the reasons for the President's veto without a reading of the letter to which he refers.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the President could have made it a part of his veto if he wished, but he did not, and the Chair does not think it is a part of the message.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. If the letter is not part of the veto message, what reasons has the President given for refusing to approve the bill, and how does the House know?

The SPEAKER. Of course, the House does not know until the letter is read.

Mr. WALSH. Then I submit there is grave doubt whether this veto message is in proper form.

Mr. WINGO. If the Speaker will allow me to suggest this, the letter does not come in the ordinary category of accompanying documents. It is part of the document itself. The document is the President's veto, and he says that he vetoes this bill for the reasons which are expressed in the letter attached and it is attached solely for the purpose of convenience and to save repetition in his message. And I submit to the Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees entirely to that, and of course the House before acting on the measure will undoubtedly wish to hear the letter. The Chair understood the gentleman from California simply wishes to refer the whole matter to the Committee on Military Affairs, which might simply save the time of reading it. The Chair does not think it is part of the message itself.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be read.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, evidently and clearly the letter is a part of the veto message. Of course, we have time to-day and will have other days, but suppose that this was the 3d of March at this time in the day, and the House wanted to vote on the veto? They would not want to vote on it without this letter, which is the foundation of the veto message.

The SPEAKER. Evidently not.

Mr. WALSH. The section of the Constitution reads as follows:

If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it.

In view of that, does the Chair hold that the letter of the Secretary of War will be entered upon the Journal of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say not.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. How are you going to extend from the record to the House his reasons unless you print the reasons he gives, which he says are contained in this document which he sends to the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a matter for the President to decide. The President in his message could have inserted the letter of the Secretary.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the letter be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the letter be read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter was read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, November 3, 1919.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I return herewith the act of Congress authorizing the restoration of Harry Graham, captain of Infantry, to his former position on the lineal list of captains of Infantry, referred to me for statement of objections, if any, to its approval.

Capt. Graham was dismissed from the service January 16, 1917, by reason of sentence of a general court-martial. He was found guilty of making a false official statement in connection with his work as a student officer in the Army School of the Line, at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., in May, 1916.

Capt. Graham was appointed a captain (temporary) in the Signal Corps February 4, 1918, upon the recommendation of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, and by the act of February 18, 1918, he was restored to duty as a captain of Infantry of the Regular Army at the foot of the lineal list of captains.

The original bill provided for Capt. Graham's restoration to his former place in the lineal list, but upon the recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives (Rept. 226, 65th Cong., 2d sess), this was amended so as to place him at the foot of the lineal list of captains of Infantry.

On August 28, 1918, Capt. Graham requested that the War Department introduce a bill in Congress to restore him to his former position. This application was disapproved by me, yet Capt. Graham apparently has succeeded in having such a bill introduced, and it was passed, without asking the War Department for its views on the question.

Capt. Graham was found guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman by a competent court. To restore him to his former position would be practically a pardon, and an injustice to those officers who served honorably and faithfully during the time Capt. Graham was out of the service, and, furthermore, would acquiesce in his action in securing the passage of this bill over the disapproval of the War Department of his request for the introduction of such a bill.

Accordingly I recommend that this act be disapproved.

Very sincerely,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] moves that the message be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, SANTA FE, N. MEX.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 681) to amend an act approved March 4, 1913, entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think the bill is so important and covering such a wide range of activities as to probably involve the expenditure of a large amount of money that I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. WALSH. It is only for a public building in one place.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I withhold my objection, then.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BLACK. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON] wish to be heard?

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to make a statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Objection is reserved. The gentleman's rights will be protected.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think I can make this clear to the House. I would like to have the bill read first.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat., p. 875), as authorized the erection of a building for the accommodation of the post office and United States courts at Santa Fe, N. Mex., be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to require that said building shall be for the accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices, exclusive of the United States courts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON] is recognized. Does the gentleman wish to make a statement.

Mr. THOMPSON. If there is no objection to the bill; no.

The SPEAKER. Objection has been reserved.

Mr. BLANTON. If I may ask the gentleman a question, I may withdraw the reservation.

Mr. THOMPSON. All right.

Mr. BLANTON. As I understand the bill, it is to segregate the offices heretofore authorized to be conducted in the building used as a courthouse and post office, or is it to combine both in one building?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is not to combine, but to segregate.

Mr. BLANTON. In other words, the original act states that a certain building shall be erected for the joint use of the post office and the courthouse. Is not that true?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And this is to have two buildings instead of one?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes. To eliminate the courthouse.

Mr. BLANTON. And have just the Federal court at that place?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Why could not the two be combined, as has been done in numerous instances all over the United States?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. The courthouse was built about 30 years ago.

Mr. BLANTON. In other words, if this bill is passed, it would require two buildings in a small place when one building would probably suffice. Is not that the case?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I will let the gentleman from Ohio make a statement.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, before discussing the merits of this bill it is my purpose to make a few general remarks concerning the city which this bill affects, namely, the city of Santa Fe, the capital of the Sunshine State of New Mexico. I visited there in March, 1916, and know from first-hand information something about the city—its history, its population, its topography, and its public buildings, ancient and modern, and about which I will tell you. I stood in the old Spanish plaza of Santa Fe, with its monuments, and watched the descendants of Conquistadores bringing pinyon firewood to town on backs of burros; watched the Indians carrying their pottery, the squaws with the papooses on their backs; watched the incoming schooners of land seekers; the devout on their way to the cathedral; the globe-trotter from all parts of the earth mingled in the throngs; and even then I did not gain a vision of more than a small sector of Santa Fe's charms. The city was important three centuries ago, before New York, Philadelphia, or Washington was thought of and before the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock. The city occupies a plain rimmed by mountains, whose peaks, snow covered, tower 10,000 and 13,000 feet. The altitude of the plain is 7,000 feet, considerably more than a mile higher than the city of Washington. Santa Fe is quaint, historic, with many attractions that are scenic, ethnological, historic, and prehistoric. It occupies a region where archæology is caught alive, as it were, because in the country round about are Pueblo Indians, who are town or community builders, and from them—their habits and customs—the experts of archæology trace the history, customs, and so forth, of the cliff dwellers, and are just beginning to bring to light much about the mound builders.

Thirty-seven miles north of Santa Fe is a prehistoric mound, which not long ago, having been excavated, disclosed from 1,200 to 1,700 rooms made and conditioned similar to those of the cliff dwellers and the present Pueblo Indians. This might be interesting to our United States Housing Corporation relative to community or apartment houses in our great cities. Such edifices with from 1,200 to 1,700 rooms are unknown, or, at best, rarities. Yet it is now known that present-day Pueblo Indians, cliff dwellers of long ago, and prehistoric races, all were community dwellers.

One of the interesting buildings at Santa Fe is the old palace of the governors, and from this building for 300 years Spain ruled a large part of North America now a part of the United States. In that building I was shown an old Spanish map, which disclosed that prior to 1846 Spanish civilization ruled as its territory Arizona, Colorado, a part of Wyoming, part of Montana, part of Texas, part of Kansas, and part of Oklahoma. The building is 1-story adobe, with walls 5 feet thick to withstand siege, occupying the entire north side of the beautiful plaza in the heart of the city. It was built in 1606—313 years ago—by Juan de Onate, who was the great grandson of Montezuma, the Aztec emperor of ancient Mexico, and the grandson of Hernando Cortez, the Spanish conqueror who subdued and took over the Aztec or Indian civilization of Mexico and, with the sword in one hand and the cross in the other, substituted Spanish civilization. The El Palacio, as the building is termed in Spanish, was originally designed for a palace, castle, and fortress. Its vicissitudes during more than three centuries, under Spanish, Indian, Mexican, and American rule, formed a most dramatic and thrilling chapter in the story of the Nation. Its history for many years was the history of a domain more extensive than the late German Empire. For three centuries it was not only the seat of government but also the home of captains general and governors, their retainers and families, and from time to time it housed the dungeon, the jail, the post office, the legislature, the supreme court, the Territorial secretary and family, the Territorial law library, and law offices. On every page of the history of the venerable edifice one finds romance, stirring incidents, and important episodes, in which the figures of Spanish conquerors and Franciscan monks, Indian chieftains and American adventurers, soldiers, statesmen, authors, scientists, and dainty society ladies step into the spotlights, to vanish again as Father Time, grim and inexorable, swings his scythe.

The population of the city of Santa Fe at present is about 10,000, of which about two-thirds are Spanish. The postal receipts of the Santa Fe post office for the year ending June 30, 1918, were $35,765.79. The report of the postmaster's receipts beginning July 1, 1918, and up to March 31, 1919, were $49,428.66. The Scottish Rite Masons have a half-million-dollar cathedral built on the Moorish style of architecture, the building being a reproduction in part of the Alhambra. And "alhambra" is a Moorish word meaning red, and the building is built out of red material or granite. Near it stands the United States Government building, imposing and massive, in front of which towers a monument bearing the following inscription:

KIT CARSON
Died May 23, 1868; age, 50 years.
He led the way.
Pioneer, Pathfinder, and Soldier.
Erected by comrades of the Grand Army of the Republic.

A quaint old building is the old adobe San Miguel Church, believed to be the oldest church building in the United States, still used for evening vespers. It was built in 1541 and is 24 years older than the settlement of St. Augustine, Fla., and 79 years older than the settlement at Plymouth Rock. It also has a bell which weighs 780 pounds and was cast in Spain in 1356 and is 560 years old and has a beautiful musical tone. When I visited there an attendant permitted me to ring the bell, who said I was almost as enthusiastic over it as Theodore Roosevelt, who visited the same spot during his first Presidency. When I asked the attendant what Teddy had said about it, he replied, "Oh, it is a bully bell."

Tourists who visit the historic Southwest of the United States should not fail to visit Santa Fe and the Archæological Society of New Mexico, located in the old El Palacio.

In the State of New Mexico there are approximately 20,000,000 acres of land subject to entry and 10,000,000 additional of forestry lands, and, of course, the land office will require considerable space in the proposed new Federal building. The land office is both a registry and receiving office, and its authority will ultimately extend over the entire State.

Mr. Speaker, I will explain the bill.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON. Let me make my explanation first. Mr. Speaker, on March 4, 1913, Congress passed an act authorizing the erection of a Federal building at Santa Fe, N. Mex., to cost $295,000. The site has been purchased, and out of the sum legislated there remains $274,500, from which the sundry civil bill set aside and appropriated and made available $150,000. Senate bill 681, which we are asking the House to pass to-day, is intended to amend the act of March 4, 1913, which authorized the construction of a building for the accommodation of the post office and the United States courts at Santa Fe. This amendment embodied in Senate bill 681 proposes that the building to be built at Santa Fe be constructed for the accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices exclusive of the United States court.

The legislation proposed to-day is based upon a communication from the Department of Justice, dated February 19, 1918, in which the following paragraph from the United States marshal is quoted: "Court officials will not require any space in the new Federal building at Santa Fe, provided practically all of the present Federal building is assigned to the use of the Department of Justice officials. Judge Neblett and all other court officials are of the opinion that it would be better to use the present Federal building for court purposes than to have space provided in the new building."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON. In a minute.

The action of the Department of Justice has been approved by the Treasury Department, and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds offer this bill in order to amend the act of March 4, 1913, so construction of a new building may be at once commenced at Santa Fe to house the various branches of the Government, as follows:

	Square feet.	Rent.
Post Office	3,350	$1,800
Internal Revenue	300
General Land Office	6,100	2,400
Department of Labor	480	425
Department of Agriculture:
States Relation Service	550
Weather Bureau	1,600	780
Forest Service	1,936	1,704
Civil Service Commission	1,000
	15,316	7,109

Because of the large increase in the cost of labor and material, the Treasury Department has estimated that it would cost $534,600 to construct an adequate building having 16,500 square feet ground area to properly house all the Government offices, including the United States district court.

If this bill is passed to-day, it will permit the Treasury Department to at once proceed with construction of a building suitable to house all offices aside from the courts and save the Government approximately $240,000. In other words, by the passage of this amendment, suitable buildings will be provided at Santa Fe to not exceed the amount of $295,000, ground and all, authorized in the act of March 4, 1913.

The proposed new Federal building will be a good building and in keeping with such buildings usually erected at State capitals. It should not be the policy of the Government to erect cheap buildings at State capitals. Santa Fe has a new State House costing $1,250,000. At present it is costing the Government $550 a month, or, $6,600 per year, in rentals for outside space, light, and fuel for the Post Office, Forestry Service, Weather Bureau, Internal Revenue, Department of Labor, States Relations Service, and Civil Service Commission. The present Federal building at Santa Fe does not meet the demands, and all these departments of the Federal Government are now housed in rented buildings. The present Federal building at Santa Fe has long since ceased to provide space enough, hence the necessity of an additional building at an early date.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question or two?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question or two?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The present building that is being used by the United States Court is a rented building, is it not?

Mr. THOMPSON. No; it is a Federal building. I would like to give the gentleman some information if he will permit me.

Mr. BLANTON. It is owned by the Government of the United States?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And there is no rental paid for it?

Mr. THOMPSON. None.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman says there are various other buildings rented, by the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Labor——

Mr. THOMPSON. And the Post Office.

Mr. BLANTON. The Post Office and various other offices, for which rental is paid?

Mr. THOMPSON. For outside buildings, there being no room in the present Federal building at Santa Fe.

Mr. BLANTON. The rental paid is less than one-half of 1 per cent interest on the building proposed now, is it not? I want to get this information for my own benefit. Is not the rental that is now paid about 1 per cent interest on the cost of the building which it is proposed to construct?

Mr. THOMPSON. This money has already been appropriated.

Mr. BLANTON. But the rental is not over 1 per cent interest, which would make a very small rental, indeed. Now, in the present circumstances, when everything is out of all proportion to normal conditions, would it not be better for us to wait 6 months or 12 months until we get back to normal, and then construct a building on a proper basis, that would house all of these Government institutions? Would it not be better to do that than to build this building now, and then later on have Congress asked to appropriate a great big sum for a new Federal building?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. The courts already have the building which they occupy.

Mr. BLANTON. But it is a small building that is inadequate for any of these other uses.

Mr. THOMPSON. Let me state what the present Government building is, if the gentleman would like the information.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be placed at the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that this bill be placed at the foot of the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, upon the insistence of some of my colleagues I withdraw the objection.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. THOMPSON. The objection has been withdrawn.

Mr. KEARNS. Yes; but I am reserving the right to object. I want to know how many of these bills the Public Buildings Committee are considering?

Mr. THOMPSON. How many bills like this?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. One other.

Mr. KEARNS. You have just gone over the country and selected certain places where you are going to put up buildings. Is that it?

Mr. THOMPSON. Oh, no. This is not a new building. This is to amend the act, so that they can go ahead with the work without increased cost to the Government.

Mr. KEARNS. Is it contemplated to report an omnibus bill for public buildings?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is proposed to pass an omnibus bill, but not at this session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I want to inquire of the gentleman regarding the present quarters of the court at Santa Fe, and whether or not if this bill be permitted to go through by the extraordinary process of unanimous consent, the old building will still continue to be subject to care by the Government?

Mr. THOMPSON. I will answer that by saying that the building will be a Federal building and will be occupied solely as a courthouse.

Mr. GARD. Is it not the better policy to sell that building and put up a good building and have the courthouse in that new building?

Mr. THOMPSON. Let me explain what the Federal courthouse is. It is not large enough to house the different bureaus of the Government. You must remember that Santa Fe is the State capital; that it was known before New York, Philadelphia, or Washington was thought of.

The present building in Santa Fe was completed in the latter part of 1889 at a cost of $142,240.50. It is stone faced, two stories and basement, approximately 55 feet by 144 feet 5 inches, with a ground area of 7,943 square feet. It contains 20,349 square feet of floor space within the walls, of which 8,559 square feet is taken up by partitions, corridors, toilets, boiler and fuel rooms, leaving for office and court-room purposes on the first and second floors 9,490 square feet and 2,300 square feet for storage and files in the basement.

The United States district court occupies all the second floor and two rooms on the first floor, in all 5,765 square feet of the available space in the building; the remainder, 3,725 square feet, is assigned to the Interior Department and occupied by the General Land Office.

Mr. GARD. Is there any regular court held in Santa Fe?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is there any resident judge at Santa Fe?

Mr. THOMPSON. Sure; it is the State capital and the headquarters for all governmental functions in the Southwest. This amendment is an absolute necessity in order that the governmental bureaus may be taken care of.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The State of New Mexico has the largest Federal holdings in it of any State in the Union—the forest reserves and the Indian activities and other Federal activities.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I have practiced in this courthouse. The Federal building is inadequate for court purposes. As I understand, the Federal Government is spending there a great deal of money all over the town for rent, and this will be a great saving of money to the Government. Is not that a fact?

Mr. THOMPSON. That is true.

Mr. GARD. What would be the objection to repairing the old Federal building so that courts could be held in it?

Mr. THOMPSON. It does need repairing, but it is not large enough to house the governmental bureaus of the United States. Santa Fe is the headquarters for all the governmental activities in the Southwest.

Mr. GARD. Is there a proposition to supplement this by improving the old building?

Mr. THOMPSON. No; the appropriation is already made, and when this building is completed it can take care of all the governmental activities.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STEENERSON. Reserving the right to object, what are the postal receipts of Santa Fe?

Mr. THOMPSON. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, $35,765.79; for the first nine months of the fiscal year from July 1, 1918, to March 31, 1919, both dates inclusive, $49,428.66.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 681) to amend an act approved March 4, 1913, entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats., p. 875), as authorized the erection of a building for the accommodation of the post office and United States courts at Santa Fe, N. Mex., be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to require that said building shall be for the accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices, exclusive of the United States courts.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 71, noes 3.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. THOMPSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. HERNANDEZ and Mr. THOMPSON, by unanimous consent, were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

REPAYMENT OF EXCESS PAYMENTS UNDER THE LAND LAWS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2129) to amend an act approved March 26, 1908, entitled "An act to provide for the repayment of certain commissions, excess payments, and purchase moneys paid under the public land laws."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. GARD and Mr. WALSH objected.

THE HAWAII NATIONAL PARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 3654) to authorize the governor of the Territory of Hawaii to acquire privately owned lands and rights of way within the boundaries of the Hawaii National Park.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

SCHOOLHOUSE IN KETCHIKAN, ALASKA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8953) to authorize the incorporated town of Ketchikan, Alaska, to issue bonds for the construction and equipment of schools therein, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the incorporated town of Ketchikan, Alaska, is hereby authorized and empowered to issue its bonds, in any sum not exceeding $ 00,000, for the purpose of constructing a schoolhouse in said town and equipping the same.

SEC. 2. That before said bonds shall be issued a special election shall be ordered by the common council of the town of Ketchikan, at which election the question of whether such bonds shall be issued shall be submitted to the qualified electors of said town of Ketchikan. Thirty days' notice of any such election shall be given by publication thereof in a newspaper printed and published and of general circulation in said town before the day fixed for such election.

SEC. 3. That the registration for such election, the manner of conducting the same, and the canvass of the returns of said election shall be, as nearly as practicable, in accordance with the requirements of law in general or special elections in said municipality, and said bonds shall be issued only upon the condition that a majority of the votes cast at such election in said town shall be in favor of issuing said bonds.

SEC. 4. That the bonds above specified, when authorized to be issued as hereinbefore provided, shall bear interest at a rate not to exceed 6 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and shall not be sold for less than their par value, with accrued interest, and shall be in denominations not exceeding $1,000 each, the principal to be due in 15 years from the date thereof: Provided, however, That the common council of the said town of Ketchikan may reserve the right to pay off said bonds in their numerical order at the rate of $10,000 or less thereof per annum at any interest period: Provided further, That on all bonds paid off the first year after date there shall be paid a premium of 2½ per cent, on all bonds paid off the second year a premium of 2 per cent, on all bonds paid off the third year a premium of 1½ per cent, and on all bonds paid off the fourth year a premium of 1 per cent besides interest. Principal and interest shall be paid in lawful money of the United States of America at the office of the town treasurer of the town of Ketchikan Alaska, or at such other place as may be designated by the common council of the town of Ketchikan, the place of payment to be mentioned in said bonds: And provided further, That each and every such bond shall have the written signature of the mayor and clerk of said town of Ketchikan and also bear the seal of said town.

SEC. 5. That no part of the funds arising from the sale of said bonds shall be used for any purpose other than that specified in this act. Said bonds shall be sold only in such amounts as the common council shall direct, and the proceeds thereof shall be disbursed by the school board of such town under the limitations hereinbefore imposed and under the direction of said common council from time to time as the same may required for the purposes aforesaid.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 15, strike out the first four letters of the line, so that it will read "annually" instead of "semiannually."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The attention of the Chair is called to the fact that on the last line of the bill the word "be" is evidently omitted after the word "may."

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the word "be" be inserted after the word "may" on page 3, line 19.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill came from the committee, did it not?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Did not the committee catch this error?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. In the copy of the bill which I have the word "be" appears, so that in the copy which has been read at the Clerk's desk it is evidently a misprint.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STRONG of Kansas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REFUNDING CERTAIN EXCESS PAYMENTS.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the bill (S. 2129) to amend an act approved March 26, 1908, entitled "An act to provide for the repayment of certain commissions, excess payments, and the purchase moneys paid under the public-land laws," which was objected to a moment ago.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. GARD. Yes; but I intend to object.

Mr. SINNOTT. This provides a time limit——

Mr. GARD. I do not think this bill should be taken up on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. I therefore object.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is to limit the time within which people can present claims against the Government, and the gentleman ought not to object to a measure of that kind. It was introduced at the request of the Interior Department.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

BRIDGE ACROSS CHOCTAWHATCHEE RIVER, FLA.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 3159) to authorize the State road department of the State of Florida to construct and maintain a bridge across the Choctawhatchee River, near Caryville, Fla., approximately 170 feet south of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad bridge, may be taken up out of order and passed. The facts are that the material is there, the building is waiting, and great public inconvenience is incurred. I hope the House will indulge me and that the Chair will recognize me for that purpose. It is a Senate bill and has already passed the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this bill on the calendar?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; it is on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, No. 98. The bridge is to be constructed by the State of Florida. The bill has already passed the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not think that is just exactly the thing to do, when we are considering the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We can not get to it to-day unless we consider it now. Heretofore we have always had consent to pass these bridge bills which are practically ministerial action.

Mr. WALSH. I did not hear the reasons for the passage of the bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The reasons are that the materials and everything are at hand, and the public authorities of Florida think it very imperative to construct this bridge at the earliest possible moment, and they are delayed awaiting the action of Congress. The bill has already passed the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. The bill has passed the Senate?

Mr. MONTAGUE. It has.

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 3159) to authorize the State road department of the State of Florida to construct and maintain a bridge across the Choctawhatchee River, near Caryville, Fla., approximately 170 feet south of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Bridge.

Be it enacted, etc., That authority is hereby granted to the State road department of the State of Florida, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Choctawhatchee River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, near Caryville, Fla., approximately 170 feet south of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad bridge, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONTAGUE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HAWAII NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 74, H. R. 3654; the objection made to the bill will be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not hear the gentleman.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 74 and take up for consideration the bill H. R. 3654; the objection will be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to return to the bill indicated. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3654) to authorize the governor of the Territory of Hawaii to acquire privately owned land and rights of way within the boundaries of the Hawaii National Park.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, my objection having been removed by assurances from the gentleman from California, I withdraw any objection on my part.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, was not this bill sent to the foot of the calendar a moment ago?

Mr. CURRY of California. I asked unanimous consent to return, and unanimous consent was given.

Mr. GARD. But you have to vacate the order sending it to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. It may be taken up by unanimous consent, even if it were sent to the foot of the calendar, the Chair thinks.

Mr. MADDEN. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. CURRY of California. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the governor of the Territory of Hawaii is hereby authorized to acquire, by exchange or otherwise, all privately owned lands lying within the boundaries of the Hawaii National Park as defined by "An act to establish a national park in the Territory of Hawaii," approved August 1, 1916, and all necessary perpetual easements and rights of way, or roadways, in fee simple, over or to said land or any part thereof.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill. Line 4, after the word "acquire," insert the words "at the expense of the Territory of Hawaii."

The SPEAKER. The bill has already been ordered to be engrossed and read the third time. The Chair thinks that will have to be vacated.

Mr. CURRY of California. I did not think the amendment was necessary, Mr. Speaker, but I offered it——

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CURRY of California. For that reason I would like——

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the bill has never been read beyond section 1. There are two sections in the bill. It has never been read beyond section 1.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate the last vote taken in order that the amendment of the gentleman from California may be offered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to vacate the last vote. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Speaker, I offer to amend section 1, line 4, after the word "acquire," add "at the expense of the Territory of Hawaii."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CURRY of California: Page 1, line 4, after the word "acquire," insert the words "at the expense of the Territory of Hawaii."

The SPEAKER. The second section of the bill has not been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the provisions of section 73 of an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, approved April 30, 1900, as amended by an act approved May 27, 1910, relating to exchanges of public lands, shall not apply in the acquisition, by exchange, of the privately owned lands herein referred to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 3.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. CURRY of California, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LIBRARY INFORMATION SERVICE.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 6870, on this calendar. I apprehend we will not reach it to-day. It is for the purpose of providing for a library information service in the Bureau of Education.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I shall not object——

Mr. WALSH. Regular order, then, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. If he is going to include this propaganda we have been getting——

The SPEAKER. Regular order is called for.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the reason.

Mr. MONDELL. The idea is that the House has a number of very important matters before it, and will have from now until adjournment. If we are to adjourn at the time we hope to, it will be necessary, probably, on several occasions, to meet as early as 11 o'clock.

Mr. ANDERSON. We have wasted enough time to-day to pass six or seven of them.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that we have wasted time. At any rate, neither the gentleman from Minnesota nor myself is responsible for the waste of time, if any was wasted. It is important we should meet a little earlier to-morrow in order to dispose of matters that are coming before the House.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think if we had begun meeting at 11 o'clock a little earlier in the session we would have been here now? If we meet at 11 o'clock now and try to push things through in a jam——

Mr. MONDELL. We are not trying to do that. But some of the matters we hope to dispose of are to be reported, and we want to take them up as soon as we can.

Mr. WALSH. Meeting at 11 o'clock will not hasten the report.

Mr. MONDELL. It will shorten the time for disposing of matters before us, so that when these bills are reported we can take them up promptly.

Mr. WALSH. What is there pending that calls for meeting at 11 o'clock.

Mr. CRAMTON. It will help us to make up the time we lost yesterday.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will reconsider that matter; I have not made this request lightly; and I have not made it without discussion with Members of the House who desire to bring up matters to-morrow. It is very important that we shall dispose of the business before the House. There is not any reason why we should not meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to know what it is.

Mr. MONDELL. There are two matters that we hope to bring up to-morrow. One is a report from the War Department investigating committee, and that will take an hour, perhaps, or an hour and a half, and in addition to that I should like to dispose of the bill from the Banking and Currency Committee that is now before the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. I object, Mr. Speaker.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:

To Mr. FULLER of Illinois, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. SINCLAIR, for an indefinite period, on account of important business.

To Mr. TOWNER, for three days, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO FILE REPORT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that just a minute? Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have permission to file a supplemental report on the bill H. R. 1125.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, November 6, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting copy of a letter addressed to the Secretary of War, calling attention to certain erroneous statements of fact and incorrect interpretations of law contained in House Document No. 1521, Sixty-fifth Congress, third session (H. Doc. No. 289); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting communication from the Acting Secretary of State, submitting estimate of appropriation for purchase of buildings and grounds for the embassy at Brussels, Belgium, fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 290); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WASON: A bill (H. R. 10365) for the purpose of improving the facilities and service of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HICKS: A bill (H. R. 10366) to provide adequate subsistence for those employed at lighthouse stations and on lightships; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 3389) for the relief of Thurman A. Poe; to the Committee on Claims.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator yield to me for a short statement in the nature of a question of personal privilege?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would be very glad to yield to the Senator. How much time will the Senator occupy?

Mr. MYERS. Two or three minutes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly, I will yield.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the Senator.

I notice in this morning's Washington Post that the account of the Senate proceedings of yesterday on the proposed amendment to the peace treaty offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] contains this statement:

Prior to the vote Senator MYERS, Democrat, announced that he would support both the La Follette amendment and the amendment, still pending, of Senator GORE, which stipulates a referendum to the people before engaging in war.

That statement is true in so far as it says I announced that I would support the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I not only announced that I would support it, but I voted for it. However, I did not say that I would support the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to refer to a vote of the people the question of making a declaration of war. I made no reference to that amendment. I do not intend to vote for it and never have intended to vote for it.

Ordinarily I pay no attention to mistaken statements in newspaper accounts about my part in the Senate proceedings, because now and then mistakes unintentionally occur about some Senator, and ordinarily they are of no consequence. I assume, of course, and am very sure that this was just an unintentional mistake on the part of the reporter. Probably he was not here when I made my remarks.

This, however, is of some consequence to me. I do not want, without denial, to be portrayed to the public as in any manner a pacifist, to any degree or any extent whatever. If there is one thing in the world which most emphatically I am not it is a pacifist of any kind or character. I would not under any circumstances vote to refer the question of a declaration of war to the people of the country. I think it would be absurd. The Constitution makes the Congress the judge of that, and I think the Congress should discharge that duty without shrinking or shirking. If Members of Congress feel that they are not capable of doing it, they should resign and let their constituents elect other Members who will discharge that constitutional duty.

I voted yesterday for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, but I do not know that I shall vote for any other amendment to the peace treaty. I have no intention of voting for any other. I intend to vote for the reservation offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to withhold our assent from Part XIII of the peace treaty, but I do not know whether or not I shall vote for any other reservation. I have just now no intention of voting for any other. It is only in the last few weeks that I came to the conclusion to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. It is only in the last few weeks that I have come to the conclusion that it would be for the best interests of this country and the world to strike Part XIII from the peace treaty or reserve it from our ratification of the treaty.

Had the radical element which appears now to dominate organized labor in this country not come out in the open and disclosed its purpose so soon, I should probably not have voted for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, but I could not but do so under existing circumstances as I now see them.

In this connection, I will say that I am well pleased with the reelection of Gov. Coolidge, of Massachusetts. There are some things which are above party. Among them are the maintenance of the American Republic, the upholding of law and order, the protection of organized society, and the defense of stable government. When my party comes out clearly, fairly, candidly, firmly, openly, and aboveboard and declares for those things, it has my earnest wishes for success. If it has the opportunity to do so and does not, it does not deserve success; neither would any other party under like circumstances.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from Wisconsin, I should like to send to the desk a brief, simple, and general reservation to America's ratification of the treaty of Versailles and its league of nations, which I propose to the pending treaty; and I ask the indulgence of the Senate for 5 or 10 minutes in order to explain the purpose of the reservation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. KNOX. I ask to have the proposed reservation read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States unreservedly advises and consents to the ratification of this treaty in so far as it provides for the creation of a status of peace between the United States and Germany.

Resolved further, That the Senate of the United States advises and consents to the ratification of this treaty, reserving to the United States the fullest and most complete liberty of action in respect to any report, decision, recommendation, action, advice, or proposals of the league of nations or its executive council or any labor conference provided for in the treaty, and also the sole right to determine its own relations and duties and course of action toward such league or toward any member thereof, or toward any other nation in respect to any question, matter, or thing that may arise while a member of such league, anything in the covenants or constitution of such league or the treaty of Versailles to the contrary notwithstanding, and also reserves to itself the unconditional right to withdraw from membership in such league and to withdraw from membership in any body, board, commission, committee, or organization whatever set up in any part of the treaty for the purpose of aiding its execution or otherwise, effecting by such withdrawal as complete a release of any further obligations and duties under such treaty as if the United States had never been a party thereto. It is also Resolved further, That the validity of this ratification depends upon the affirmative act of the principal allied powers named in the treaty of peace with Germany approving these reservations and certifying said approval to the United States within 60 days after the deposit of the resolution of ratification by the United States.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the only purpose and effect of this reservation is to make the United States a consulting member of the league of nations; to put the United States in the league, in principle, without making us an integral part of the league in all its complicated detail and in all its perilous and questionable obligations; to put the United States in position to exert its influence or not when and for whatever purpose this Nation may or may not deem it good to do so through the league; to put the United States in touch with the league, but to prevent the United States from being interned or interred in the league; and to avoid the pretense of undertaking to do things which we should, we all know, be unable to do without alike violating the Constitution of the United States and doing violence to the will and the very nature of the American people.

This war found us in a situation where we were free to serve the world and to stand up for international right. We did so. I hope we may ever do so.

Be it remembered that it was precisely as a consulting member of the alliance, and bound only by the national conscience, that America brought her military power and her vast resources to the aid of those who fought for right, and by doing so brought victory in this war. If we can carry on war as an independent member of an alliance, may we not carry on peace as an independent member of a league? It is no strange policy that I propose, no heartless aloofness from world affairs. It was by being faithful exactly to the policy I now advocate that America had become great enough to bring victory. It was in adhering to this very policy that America did, when the test came, bring victory and save the world.

To declare, as I have before suggested, that "if a situation should arise in which any power should, directly or indirectly, menace the freedom and peace of Europe, the United States would regard such situation with grave concern as a menace to its own freedom and peace, and would consult with other powers affected, with a view to concerted action for the removal of such menace," is but to generalize as a policy what has been the specific action of America. On no great occasion could America be asked to do more for the world. Under no league could America do more for the world than she has done by the guidance of her own conscience. Declared or not, the above is the approved policy of America. With or without any relation whatsoever to the league, American diplomacy can stand upon that policy. By becoming a consulting member of the league, the league, too, becomes available to us for the maintenance of that policy. On great occasions America will not be found wanting. By little occasions it is far better that America be not distracted from her real work, that the energy needed for national progress be not dissipated in internationalism.

It is as a consulting member of the league, free and true to ourselves, that we shall best serve America and that we shall best serve the world. As a consulting member of the league we shall be able to use its machinery for every good purpose; we shall not be imperiled of being ground and destroyed in the cogs of that machinery.

By becoming a consulting member of the league I wish to see America do a great part in service to the world. By becoming more, America would stultify herself for the service of right in the world and would at the same time put in jeopardy her own precious heritage.

Not under any circumstances would I sacrifice the spirit, the character, the nationalism of America, or the Constitution and the institutions that have bred America's manhood and womanhood. If we plunge America into this welter of internationalism we shall destroy America, and, in the name of good to the world, we shall make our country incapable of good either to the world or to ourselves.

As a consulting member of the league we shall do our full duty to the rest of the world. We shall be free to turn calmly to the great problems we have to meet here at home. Free and untrammeled, with safe frontiers, America's task is to perfect America's own national life in America's own way. Only so can America—North, South, East, and West—the America we all love, endure. Only so can America irradiate an ever higher influence in the world.

Internationalism would destroy us at home. Nationalism will save us at home. If there is anything through which we can do good to the world it is our Americanism. If we sacrifice our Americanism we destroy America. If we sacrifice that distinctive thing we destroy the hope that the world has in America. We are the salt of the earth, and for the earth "Salt is good"; but if the salt have lost his savour, wherewith shall it be seasoned? It is neither fit for the land, nor yet for the dunghill; but men cast it out. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Thus spoke the Savior of mankind, and, to paraphrase another divine expression, What will it profit America to gain the world and lose its own soul?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. The speech entire is as follows:

November 5, 1919.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Constitution provides that the President of the United States shall have "power by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

That this constitutional provision was disregarded by the President in making the treaty now before the Senate for concurrence can not successfully be denied. Had the President obeyed the Constitution in making this treaty by and with the advice of the Senate, the treaty would have been so framed as to have embodied the views of the Senate as well as those of the President, and whenever the treaty came to the Senate for formal action its early concurrence therein would have been a foregone conclusion.

Through the interchange of views between the President and the Senate contemplated by the Constitution while the treaty was in the process of making, differences of opinion, if any, would have been discovered and reconciled in the legal, orderly course of procedure commanded by the Constitution. In such interchange of views neither party would have had an advantage over the other. Under such procedure the President and the Senate would have been equally free to consider the proposed treaty on its merits, and neither could have been coerced into surrendering honest convictions as an alternative to abandoning the treaty. This, sir, is the rational procedure ordained by the fathers in their wisdom when they framed our Constitution.

It has been asserted here and elsewhere that business is stagnant, prices exhorbitant, labor and capital unsettled and resentful, and industrial conditions alarming in the extreme, because this treaty was not at once concurred in and duly ratified. Such a statement wholly ignores the real cause of the grave industrial situation which confronts us; but if it were true in any sense that the nonconcurrence in the treaty up to the present time contributed in any degree to the present industrial unrest, then, sir, the responsibility for that situation rests upon one man, and that man is the President of the United States. For it is his departure from the letter and spirit of the Constitution in the making of the treaty that has led the Senate to spend months in its consideration, and may result in its final rejection.

I do not know why the President in making this treaty refused to obey the plain mandate of the Constitution, and refused to follow the precedents established by the great Presidents Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, Grant, and others who sought and received the advice of the Senate in all stages of treaty making where they felt that they were dealing with questions which were vitally important to the country upon which the opinion of the Senate should be taken.

If, sir, the President had in mind and expected that there would be written into this treaty covenants and provisions which more than a third of the Senate might feel impelled, under their oaths, to reject, had they been advised with while the treaty was being framed, then the conduct of the President is easily understood in refusing to advise with the Senate while the treaty was in the making. If before the negotiations were complete the Senate had advised the President that it disapproved of certain articles, there would have been no excuse for the President to incorporate such articles in the treaty; and if, nevertheless, they were incorporated and written in the treaty and the treaty rejected on account of them, the record would then have fixed the responsibility upon the President.

When he placed the treaty before the Senate, however, the whole situation was changed. Then he knew that many Senators strongly opposed to the terms of the treaty on principle would be constrained, as we daily and hourly have witnessed from the lips of Senators that they are constrained, to accept it and concur in it, though they regarded it as a menace to our peace if not to the very existence of constitutional government.

Mr. President, there is so much in this treaty hostile to American interests and destructive of American ideals, so much of iniquity and spoliation that violates national honor and challenges American resentment, that Senators have directed their attacks solely upon these odious provisions of the treaty. In so doing I venture to say that they ignore that which is even more important than the treaty itself: They have permitted to pass unchallenged the illegal and unconstitutional manner in which the treaty was framed.

It has been almost a daily occurrence in this debate for one Senator after another to arraign and condemn important provisions of the treaty and then surrender his judgment with the concluding statement that he was constrained to vote to concur in it, to the end that we might as soon as possible conclude some sort of a treaty of peace.

A treaty so framed and concurred in does not represent the judgment of the Senate, in conformity with the Constitution.

It was to guard against such an event that the framers of the Constitution provided that the President should advise with the Senate in making all treaties. If this be not the plain meaning of the Constitution, then the words "by and with the advice" of the Senate have no meaning at all. After a treaty has been signed and sealed in secret without the advice of the Senate and is then presented for concurrence there is no longer anything to advise with the President about. The work is complete. The treaty has been framed. Presumably every article in it has already received his careful consideration and his approval, and his signature has been affixed to the document. The same thing, sir, is true of the representatives of some 30 other nations, signatories to the treaty, gathered from all parts of the world. When the treaty comes to the Senate it is true that the Senate still has the technical right to concur in it, even to reject it.

But that is only one-half of the constitutional duty of the Senate in making treaties. The provision of the Constitution that the treaty shall be made with the Senate's advice is just as mandatory as that it shall be concurred in by two-thirds of the Senators present before it can become effective.

Mr. President, let us look more closely at this construction of the provision of the Constitution.

What has the Senate really to do with making a treaty of peace?

Does the Constitution lodge in this body the express right to participate in the making of a treaty?

Has the Senate any duty to perform other than to "consent," or refuse to consent, to a treaty after it shall have been completed, signed, and submitted to this body by the President?

Article II, section 2, of the Constitution provides:

He—

The President—

shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

Note well the language of the Constitution.

The words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" immediately follow the words "he shall have power."

They limit, modify, and restrict the power of the President in the act of making a treaty the moment he begins to exercise that power.

The framers of the Constitution used words with accuracy and exactness.

The only meaning of the word "by" given in any standard authority which could aptly apply to the text is "through" or "according to." The use of "with," upon all authority, signifies association, conjunction, alliance, assistance, harmony. As Webster states it, "association in respect of accompaniment, conjunction, interaction"; "association by way of alliance"; "association by way of simultaneousness"; "association in respect of sphere of jurisdiction."

And what is the obvious meaning of the word "advice"?

It means "to counsel; to give an opinion recommended as worthy to be followed."

But when should "advice" and "counsel" be sought? When as to the making of a treaty should it be given?

Manifestly it should be given, if at all, when it would be most effective; while the scope and terms and covenants of the treaty are being formulated, while the minds of those directly engaged in making the instrument are most open to receive "advice" and "counsel" "worthy to be followed."

It is idle to say that the Constitution means that the President should advise with the Senate after the treaty has been put in final form, and has been duly signed by the accredited delegates to the peace conference.

That is not the meaning of the language of the Constitution. Its plain terms deny any such construction. If that were the meaning of the Constitution, then the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" would have been left out altogether, and the section would have simply provided that the President shall have the power to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur. And, sir, if that were the language of the Constitution, if there had been eliminated the provision which, with much thought and consideration, as I shall show, was put in by the constitutional convention—"with the advice of the Senate"—if those words had been eliminated and it was simply provided that "the President shall have the power to make treaties with the concurrence of the Senate," even that language would have been sufficient to require a right-minded President, who desired to consult the country's welfare, and not merely his own arbitrary will, to confer with the Senate during the making of a treaty, lest the Senate, at the last moment, might withhold its consent from a treaty so momentous in the making of which it had no part.

But the framers of the Constitution wisely did not leave the matter there. It makes the "advice" of the Senate just as much a necessary part of the framing of the treaty as it makes the "consent" of the Senate necessary to its final execution.

But go a step further. What is it the President shall have power to do "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate"? Why, "he shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties."

"To make," according to all authority, is "to create," "to frame," "to construct."

What better word could have been chosen to express the purpose and intent of the framers of the Constitution?

It puts the "advice," the "counsel," of the Senate into every act of the President, after he shall have opened the negotiations, in making, framing, and constructing the treaty, from the beginning to the end, from its inception until its completion.

The President violates the strict and literal mandate of the Constitution, as well as its spirit, when he makes, frames, and constructs the treaty without advice and consultation with the Senate.

It is too late for the advice to be effective after the treaty is made and signed and passes out of his hands and into the possession of the Senate.

It is no answer to say that the Senate can then amend the treaty and refuse to concur in it unless the amendments are accepted.

True, they have that power, but the conditions then operate to deprive them of that freedom of judgment which the Constitution intended to confer upon them as an unconstrained aid in perfecting that instrument.

Why, Mr. President, we have daily, almost hourly, manifestations of that fact. It is perfectly apparent that there is a majority of Members of the Senate here who feel that they can not exercise their independent judgment on the provisions of this treaty as they would have been able to do if they had been advised with while the treaty was in the making, as was provided by the men who framed the Constitution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will pardon me, I prefer to go on with my argument, which is close-knit. I shall be glad to have the Senator make notes upon it and question me when I get through.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not any desire to do so, because it is only at this point——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But just at this point the Senator can make his notes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator declines to make them.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And then he can question me when I get through.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is the orderly way of making an argument in court, or in any other place excepting in the Senate. The Senate debates have degenerated into quilting-bee conversations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, Mr. President; I do not yield. I will proceed with this argument as I have prepared it, and the Senator can question me when I get through, and I shall be glad to answer him.

To amend the treaty at that stage—that is, after it reaches the Senate—and the Senator ought to be able to see that there should be no interruption at this point, from the context of what I am saying—to amend the treaty at that stage would subject the Senate to the charge of delaying and, it may be, altogether defeating the ratification of the treaty.

What is this curious atmosphere that surrounds the gentlemen who are known on this side of the Chamber as mild reservationists? It is an atmosphere that is impervious to argument. They fear to take the responsibility for the delay necessary to perfect it by amendment, and that is exactly what the Executive anticipated.

Of course, I can understand the psychology of the mild reservationists in this body. They reason that if amended this treaty must go back to the President. If his mind has become set and fixed as to its terms—and who doubts that it is somewhat set and somewhat fixed? [laughter]—he may deadlock the whole proceeding by refusing to transmit it with the proposed Senate amendments to the other high contracting parties. If he does transmit the treaty as amended by the Senate to the other governments concerned, it is at that late day certain to cause friction and delay, which may in the end result in the failure of the treaty. I take it, Mr. President, that that is what troubles so many of the Senators who do not like the terms of this treaty, who, if they could have been consulted as parties to the contract, as was provided by the framers of the Constitution, would quickly have voted to change certain provisions; but they are constrained by the circumstances which surround us at this hour. It seems to me that that is exactly what the President of the United States contemplated; that he contemplated that he was in a position to control and completely coerce the Senate of the United States and annul that provision of the Constitution.

The possibility of this outcome may well have the effect to coerce the Senate into accepting a treaty containing provisions of doubtful meaning or omissions of great importance to our Government, or into yielding and reluctantly concurring in a treaty some of the covenants of which may even contain the germs of national disaster.

Never before in the history of this Republic were we party to the making of any treaty of such far-reaching influence upon the destiny of this Nation, the freedom and happiness, the weal or woe of our own people, as that which was made at Paris, without the advice of the Senate, and which is now before us for concurrence.

Any President with a due regard for the awful responsibilities involved in this undertaking ought to have welcomed counsel and advice. Certainly he should have been the last to deny participation, at every step of the proceedings, as the terms and conditions were being wrought out line by line, to the United States Senate, which is specifically named in the Constitution as a part of the treaty-making power. And he should have been ready to accord, not a reluctant, narrow, technical compliance with the letter of that constitutional provision, but he should have extended a cordial and prompt hospitality to all advice and counsel from the Senate within the broadest conception of the spirit of the Constitution.

What would be said of a President who, while in France conducting the negotiations for this treaty, deliberately refused, if the Senate had been in session, to receive communications and advice from the Senate concerning those negotiations?

Could there be any doubt in anyone's mind that there would be but one answer to make to such an abuse of power by the Executive? Yet how would this conduct differ in effect from that by which the Executive just as effectively stopped his ears and closed his mind to the advice of the Senate by refusing to convene that body in session while this treaty was in the making?

I turn aside for a moment, Mr. President, to consider the evolution of the President.

Prior to his becoming a candidate for governor of New Jersey, Woodrow Wilson was known among those who were at all familiar with anything he had written as a pronounced reactionary. However, a short time before he essayed to enter politics he announced a radical change in views and became a very ardent advocate of liberal, progressive democracy.

But President Wilson in 1919 is no longer the "forward-looking" progressive he appeared to be as governor of New Jersey and in his first years as President. That interesting period seems to have been mainly a rhetorical exhibition, in which the highest achievements are recorded in The New Freedom and his essays on "Making the world safe for democracy."

As he has progressed backward in these later years he presents what might be called a typical case of atavistic reversion.

For example, as to the treaty-making power, President Wilson now reverts to the uniquely autocratic views of Woodrow Wilson of 1908. His opinions upon these powers, as set forth in 1908, have no counterpart—in so far as I am advised—in all the literature on that important provision of the Constitution.

He is the first of all of our Presidents openly to challenge the constitutional right and duty of the Senate to advise and counsel with the President in the making of a treaty. Nay, more than that, he asserts that the President has the autocratic power to coerce the Senate into concurring in a treaty to which it may even be opposed.

From his book, Constitutional Government in the United States, first published in 1908 and reprinted as late as December, 1917, I quote the following:

> One of the greatest of the President's powers I have not yet spoken of at all: His control, which is very absolute, of the foreign relations of the Nation. The initiative in foreign affairs, which the President possesses without any restriction whatever, is virtually the power to control them absolutely.

Now, we begin to get a picture of the inside of this man's mind, away back in 1908.

> The President can not conclude a treaty with a foreign power without the consent of the Senate, but he may guide every step of diplomacy, and to guide diplomacy is to determine what treaties must be made, if the faith and prestige of the Government are to be maintained.

That is, he can put the Government in such a place that its honor is committed to the carrying out of that provision that would not otherwise be carried out.

Mr. McCORMICK rose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just let me conclude the quotation. He says further:

> He need disclose no step of negotiation until it is complete, and when in any critical matter it is completed the Government is virtually committed. Whatever its disinclination, the Senate may feel itself committed also.

He thinks he has it committed, and he has evidently some gentlemen on this side committed.

This statement was of little importance at the time it first appeared in a small edition of classroom lectures to his college students. Its author, Mr. Wilson, was a gentleman who had failed as a lawyer and had become a college professor of "jurisprudence and politics." His views upon this subject at that time—1908—would not specially have interested anyone except for the fact that artful circumventing standards of political ethics which this quotation evidences were being taught to college students.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. Perhaps the same view of the powers of the President to commit the country has become current in Europe through some medium, because Stephane Lausanne, of the Paris Matin, returning from Brussels, announced the course which France would pursue "if America did not keep her word," the implication being that some power unknown to the Constitution had pledged the word of America in Paris.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly. Now, to take up the thread of my thought.

It is quite another matter now. By the accidents of political fortune Mr. Wilson, the author of the foregoing paragraph, is now President Wilson. Curious things happen in this Government of ours.

He chose to constitute himself a direct participant in making the treaty of Versailles. It transcends infinitely in importance any other to which this Nation was ever a party.

And President Wilson properly having taken the initiative in opening communications with the representatives of other nations, and thus being in control of the situation up to that point, by the Machiavelian method suggested by Woodrow Wilson in 1908, usurped sole and exclusive power, as he says, to—

> Guide every step of diplomacy—
>
> As to himself decide and—
> Determine what treaties must be made, if the faith and prestige of the Government are to be maintained.

But he goes further than that. This is not enough to satisfy the peculiar sinuous working of that mind. He carried it to the monstrous conclusion that the President, and I quote his words, "need disclose no step of negotiation until it is complete, and when in any critical matter it is completed the Government is virtually committed. Whatever its disinclination, the Senate may feel itself committed also." And I take it that a considerable number of Senators on this side feel themselves so pushed into a corner that they are in a way committed also to this unconstitutional method of making treaties.

In so doing, President Wilson manifested a willful, stubborn disregard of his constitutional obligations and the honorable precedents of other Presidents.

It is an accepted canon of construction that the meaning of any law is to be found in its own language. As an aid to the determination of an ambiguous statute, resort may be had to the discussion of the legislative debates and to legislative journals. The treaty-making power of the Constitution is not involved in any ambiguity. However, it may be of interest in this connection to notice briefly the historic setting of this provision. It will aid to a clear understanding of the intention of the framers of the Constitution to start with the thought in mind that the making of a treaty is the exercise of a sovereign power.

When the Colonies achieved independence, the right of sovereignty, carrying with it the treaty-making power, became inherent in each of the thirteen States. In forming the Continental Congress, the State was made the voting unit, and the treaty-making power was exercised through the State acting in its sovereign right.

Under the Articles of Confederation each State retained its sovereignty and had one vote. Provision was made in the articles that no one State should enter into a treaty with any king, prince, or foreign State without the consent of Congress. The Congress was given the authority to enter into treaties. But so jealous were the States of their sovereign treaty-making power that it was provided in the articles that no treaty could be made excepting by and with the vote of nine States. I emphasize this because it bears upon the Senate's power in making treaties. This conception of the close association with the power of making treaties and sovereignty in each of the States becomes a material consideration in construing and in tracing the historical development of this matter in the Constitutional Convention. Hence when the Constitutional Convention met to form a more perfect Union on the 25th of May, 1787, the delegates there assembled were imbued with the idea that the treaty-making power was inherent in the sovereignty of the States. It was so agreed that each State should be represented in the United States Senate.

Therefore it logically followed, when it came to dealing with the delegation of the treaty-making power to the new government that they were about to form, that they should lodge that great power exclusively in the United States Senate, and that is what they did. In the first construction of our Constitution you can see how their minds were working. You only need to trace the history of this provision to get the psychology of the men who were making our Constitution.

So we find in the first draft of the Constitution presented to the convention by Mr. Pinckney on the 29th of May, that it contains the provision with respect to treaties which I shall read. Just listen to it, Senators, and see what a monstrous change has been imposed upon this Republic from that conceived by the men who formed it:

> ART. 7. The Senate shall have the sole and exclusive power to declare war and to make treaties.

That is the first draft of our Constitution. It is a far cry from that provision, Mr. President and Senators, to having treaty making controlled by one mind. Thus it will be seen that in the first draft of the Constitution the President was not even mentioned in connection with the power of making treaties.

This draft of the Constitution, presented by Mr. Pinckney, was presented on the 29th of May. As I remember it, the convention assembled on the 14th of May. There was but a meager attendance at that time, and because of the meager attendance of delegates an adjournment was taken to, I think, the 25th of May; and on the 25th of May the delegates assembled in such numbers that they organized the Constitutional Convention, and Gen. George Washington was elected its president and William Jackson, as I now remember it, was elected its secretary.

So it was organized for business about the 25th of May, and on the 28th or 29th of May Charles C. Pinckney presented to that Constitutional Convention a working draft of a constitution for this Government of ours.

Impressed by the fact that with the power of making treaties goes hand in hand sovereignty, that each of the thirteen Colonies had the power of making treaties because of their independent sovereignty, when they organized into the Confederation that provision was recognized, and the vote by States was carried over into the provisions of the Articles of Confederation and expressed there and perfected. So if each of the States was to be represented in the legislative body here and have equal voting powers, known as the United States Senate in the new government that they were about to form, it was perfectly logical and perfectly natural in the working of the mind of Charles C. Pinckney that in the first draft he submitted he should have incorporated the provision that treaties should be made by the States represented in the United States Senate on an equal voting basis.

Mr. President, as I have studied the proceedings of that convention, I find that on June 18, a little less than a month after the Constitutional Convention convened, Alexander Hamilton made an address before the convention, and in that address he submitted, in a tentative way, some suggestions—as he says, mere suggestions—for the consideration of the committee that was working upon the building up of the constitutional provisions. Among the suggestions that he made I find this one, and it is the first time that in the Constitutional Convention the President appears to have been thought of by anybody in connection with the treaty-making power. I think that is rather interesting.

I quote the following:

The authorities and functions of the Executive to be as follows:

I omit enumerating other functions and come to the one in question:

To have, with the advice and approbation of the Senate, the power of making all treaties.

But, sir, I am unable to find from that time on that he had so impressed any delegates in the Constitutional Convention that the matter was taken up and advocated by any one member of the convention. They still adhered to the plan that treaties should be made by the United States Senate, because the United States Senate represented the States on an equal voting basis.

Then a committee on detail—that is, a committee to work out the details of the Constitution—was appointed. It presented its report on August 6. It reported as to treaties the following:

Article IX, section 1. The Senate of the United States shall have power to make treaties.

I find the next reference August 15. Mr. Mercer, a delegate who was a factor in that convention, made the suggestion that the treaty-making power ought to be lodged solely with the Executive. There was not any discussion upon his suggestion, as revealed by the notes. Mark you, it was on the 15th day of August that he made that suggestion.

On September 4 Mr. Brierly, of the committee of 11, the committee on detail, reported to the convention several propositions, among which was the one dealing with this question of making treaties, and I have it before me. That was on the 4th day of September, 13 days and only 13 days before the Constitutional Convention adjourned. Then for the first time the President was brought into the report of the committee which was preparing the draft of the Constitution for the final action of the convention in substantially the same form in which we have it now.

Mr. President, I think the history of that is of some significance. I think it shows that it was clearly the purpose of the framers of the Constitution to withhold from the President any participation in the making of treaties until it was suggested that the Senate, being a legislative body, would require some agency for communicating with foreign nations in the making of a treaty and that the Executive was a proper agency.

That suggestion was made by Madison. It was adopted, and the Executive was brought into the treaty-making power.

The men who were looking to the perpetuity of democracy for the light of the world never rested it upon one mind. You can not find it in the Constitution.

I tell you, Senators, never in all of your service in this body—I care not how long you have served—have you been brought to or which now faces us. Will you yield in this matter and write into the history of the proceedings of this Government a precedent that surrenders all control of our intercourse with the foreign Governments of the world practically to one mind? It was clearly the purpose of the framers of the Constitution to withhold from the President the exclusive authority to make treaties. Indeed, it was at a late hour in the proceedings of the convention that they admitted the Executive to a participation in it. They regarded it as too vast a power, fraught with too serious consequences, to be committed to the sole discretion of one man. A badly conceived and unwisely constructed treaty might prove a costly venture. It might involve the country in the gravest difficulties, the most embarrassing entanglements. It might even convert a covenant designed to secure peace into an instrument to force us into war. To safeguard against the dangers incident to the mistakes and errors of a one-man judgment and the menace of an overreaching ambition, the framers of the Constitution vested the treaty-making power in the President and the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, after this somewhat too extended excursion into the historical aspects of this, to me, very interesting matter, let us come back to a consideration of this provision of the Constitution. I have already quoted it unnecessarily, for it is familiar to every Senator, but it seems to me that this provision ought to be given some meaning.

Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons versus Ogden, said:

As men whose intentions require no concealment generally employ words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who framed our Constitution and the people who adopted it must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense and to have intended what they said.

When, therefore, the Constitution commands that the President and the Senate shall advise together in making a treaty, it was clearly intended that each side should be free to receive or to reject the advice of the other; but, as I have said, when this treaty was presented to the Senate for its consideration, it was no longer possible for the President to accept and to conform to the advice of the Senate if the advice involved changing any of the terms of the treaty. The time for advice was when the treaty was being negotiated and debated at the conference table and was still subject to change by the representatives of the 31 Governments parties to the agreement; but that time had passed when the treaty was first brought before the Senate; and it had been, I believe, the deliberate purpose of the President to deprive the Senate, in so far as he could, of all influence in making the treaty.

In Gerrald versus Mobley, in Thirteenth Otto, page 580, Justice Field said:

A constitutional provision should not be so construed as to defeat its evident purpose, but rather so as to give it effective operation and suppress the mischief at which it is aimed.

Now, what was the mischief at which this constitutional provision was aimed which required the President and the Senate to advise together in making a treaty? It was aimed at the mischief of too great power in making treaties being exercised by one man.

Alexander Hamilton, fresh from active participation in the Constitutional Convention, addressing the people of New York pending their ratification of the Constitution, emphasized the importance of the Senate's "joint and concurrent participation in making treaties." Those are his words. What does that mean?

Speaking of the danger of lodging with one man, the President of the United States, the exclusive authority to make treaties and control foreign relations, he said:

However proper and safe it may be, in governments where the executive magistrate is an hereditary monarch, to commit to him the entire power of making treaties, it would be utterly unsafe and improper to intrust that power to an elective magistrate of four years' duration.

Again, he says:

The history of human conduct does not warrant that exalted opinion of human virtue, which would make it wise in a nation to commit interests of so delicate and momentous a kind, as those which concern its intercourse with the rest of the world, to the sole disposal of a magistrate, created and circumstanced as would be a President of the United States.

Mr. President, I grant that the Senate still has the power to reject this treaty; it still has the power to amend it; but I say to Senators here that every man within the reach of my voice knows that Senators have been under constraint in voting as to changing this treaty. It never was intended by the makers of the Constitution that they should be under constraint, but we can not get the independent judgment of Senators as to the language of the treaty, although upon the language of the treaty may hang the lives of millions of our soldier boys.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield in a moment. It never was intended, I say, that the coordinate treaty-making power—the Senate—should by the Machiavelian tactics of an Executive be placed in a position where it could not exercise its independent judgment in framing treaties. Now I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have no doubt the Senator has noted in the newspapers nearly every day, and I think in those of this morning, statements to the effect that Senators are waiting the orders of the President before they determine how they are going to vote, if certain reservations are put on.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, Mr. President, I have noted that. I have noted it, as I have noted other things that have transpired under this administration. Oh, never before in the history of this Republic has there been known anything, faintly or remotely, approaching the servile, abject, cringing attitude of the legislative department of the Government to the Executive; and I am taking the time of the Senate to protest and to seek to arouse some unity of action here which will assert and will preserve, sir, to us and to our children the letter and spirit of the Constitution that cost us so much in blood and treasure. Senators, in God's name what justification can be made for this surrender of the Senate's constitutional right when the Constitution imposes upon you your independent duty under your oath to support the Constitution?

Too many Senators have voted down amendments which in their hearts and in their consciences they believed to be just and knew were right and knew ought to be written into this treaty, but because the treaty has come to the Senate in this form and through violation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

Listen to Hamilton further. Fortunately we have the voice and the thinking of these men here, preserved in the printed page occasionally to make its appeal. Will you not heed that? Listen to Hamilton.

Also, in the same address, he said that if we would attend carefully to the subject—

It—

The treaty-making power—

will be found to partake more of the legislative than of the executive character.

And in the same address he spoke of the danger involved in giving—listen—an ambitious President too great treaty-making power. He said:

An ambitious man might make his own aggrandizement, by the aid of a foreign power, the price of his treachery to his constituents.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator repeat that, please?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Gladly. Listen again to this admonition from Hamilton:

An ambitious man might make his own aggrandizement, by the aid of a foreign power, the price of his treachery to his constituents.

Since the mischief at which the constitutional provision was aimed, which gave to the Senate coordinate power with the Executive in making treaties, was plain and well understood, and the language of the Constitution directly and aptly confers this power upon the Senate, I might at this point rest my argument to show that the President proceeded in violation of the Constitution in making this treaty.

But I am going further than that and call to the attention of the Senate the precedents upon this subject established by Presidents whose learning, devotion to duty, and loyalty to the institutions of our country can not be questioned.

President Washington's administration, following immediately upon the adoption of the Constitution, and numbering among its members many of those who had been prominent in framing the Constitution, furnishes the most persuasive proof as to what the men of that time understood the Constitution to require of the President in the exercise of his treaty-making power.

The first treaty ever negotiated by our Government, so far as I have learned, was with the southern Indians early in President Washington's first administration. The method of procedure in that case, though involving nothing more than a treaty with an Indian tribe, was such as to carry out the letter and the spirit of the Constitution. President Washington first sent a message to the Senate in which he advised the Senate that he wished to meet with it the following day "to consider the terms of a treaty to be negotiated with the southern Indians." This message was sent to the Senate August 21, 1789. President Washington accordingly the next day came to the Senate, accompanied by Gen. Knox, a soldier who was prepared to answer questions pertaining to the Indians, though he was not otherwise an officer of the Government, and the President briefly stated the purpose of the meeting. Seven specific questions were submitted to the Senate as to the "proposed negotiations." The President requested a vote by the Senate upon each of the seven propositions. The Senate took the questions under advisement and postponed action until the following Monday, at which time it voted in favor of only a part of the seven propositions stated.

Some two or three weeks before President Washington asked the advice of the Senate concerning the negotiation of the treaty I have just mentioned, the Senate had already appointed a committee to determine the manner in which communications respecting treaties should be conducted between the President and the Senate. President Washington communicated his views to this committee, stating, in substance, that "in case of treaties oral communications seem to be indispensably necessary, because of the variety of subjects embraced in them which would not only require consideration but might undergo much discussion. (See Crandall on Treaties, 2d ed., p. 67.)

That indicates how the Senate and President Washington viewed this question. Oh, how far have we traveled, and in what an untoward direction! Where are we going? Is this to be a Republic, or is this to be a Government controlled by one man? You must answer to your consciences and to your constituents on this issue, for it is not to be settled here to-day or to-morrow or with the disposition of this treaty. This question goes to the very foundations of the life of this Republic, and there are, thank God, in this country men loyal enough to our free institutions to carry this question from this Hall to the American people, the sovereign power of this Republic, for final determination.

So far as I have been able to find, President Washington throughout his two terms of office never failed to ask the advice of the Senate respecting the negotiation of all treaties which were made while he was President.

We know that on August 4, 7, and 11, 1790, and January 18, 1792, and March 23, 1792, the President asked the advice of the Senate as to negotiating various treaties with the Indian tribes.

In a message to the Senate on August 4, 1790, respecting the proposed treaty with the Creek Indians, the President said:

In consequence of the general principles agreed to by the Senate in August, 1789, the adjustment of the terms of a treaty is far advanced between the United States and the chiefs of the Creek Indians, now in this city, in behalf of themselves and the whole Creek Nation.

You will note here that a year prior to the date of this communication the President had advised with the Senate and secured from it an opinion as to the general principles which should be embodied in the treaty. Following out those principles, it seems that a year's negotiations were in progress. It further appears from this communication from the President to the Senate, under date of August 4, that the President was embarrassed in his dealings with the Creek Indians, because British merchants importing their goods, through Spanish ports, had a monopoly of the trade with the Creeks, and brought about disorder and discontent among the Indians. The President therefore submitted to the Senate whether a secret treaty might be negotiated with the Indian chiefs to obviate this difficulty.

On August 11, 1790, the President, in a message to the Senate in reference to a proposed treaty with the Cherokee Indians, said:

On this point, therefore, I state the following precedents, and request the advice of the Senate thereon:

First. Is it the judgment of the Senate that overtures shall be made to Cherokees to arrange a new boundary so as to embrace the settlements made by the white people since the treaty of Hopewell, in November, 1785?

President Washington thought that in fixing this boundary, this little boundary, a mere short span upon the map, that the Senate ought to be consulted and advised with before he put it into the fixed terms of a treaty to be submitted for them to concur in. But he who is now President has joined in a treaty that changes the boundaries of the world, and he has done that without a suggestion from the United States Senate, or an intimation of any desire to have their advice, and has done it in such a way, as indicated by the attitude of many Senators, that he can not secure the independent opinion of those Senators in deciding as to whether he pursued a proper course.

Second. If so, shall compensation to the amount of ——— dollars annually or of ——— dollars in gross be made to the Cherokees for the land they shall relinquish, holding the occupiers of the land accountable to the United States for its value?

Third. Shall the United States stipulate solemnly to guarantee the new boundary which may be arranged?

Those were the questions that he submitted to the Senate to be advised upon by the Senate in pursuance of what he thought to be the requirements of the Constitution in treaty making.

On January 18, 1792, President Washington addressed the Senate as follows:

I lay before you the communications of a deputation from the Cherokee Nation of Indians now in this city, and I request your advice whether an additional article shall be made to the Cherokee treaty to the following effect, to wit:

That the sum to be paid annually by the United States to the Cherokee Nation of Indians in consideration of the relinquishment of lands as stated in the treaty made by them on the 2d day of July, 1791, shall be $1,500 instead of $1,000 mentioned in the said treaty.

You will note here how trivial was the amount involved, how simple the negotiations; and yet, sir, because of the principle involved, and because he wished to obey the Constitution, President Washington did not proceed to negotiate even the simple treaty here proposed and the determination of the amount—between $1,500 and $1,000—without first requesting the advice of the Senate upon the subject.

November 6, 1919.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, at the conclusion of the session on yesterday one of the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber paid me the compliment of saying that he had been much impressed with my argument that it was the duty of the President, under the Constitution, to advise with the Senate in making a treaty; but he suggested that, with the peace commission sitting in Paris, remote from this country, it would be very difficult for the President to advise with the Senate. I reminded him, and I remind the Senate, that the President, when he withdrew himself from this country at the beginning of the December session of Congress in 1918, in an address to the two Houses, said:

The cables and the wireless will render me available for any counsel or service you may desire of me, and I shall be happy in the thought that I am constantly in touch with the weighty matter of domestic policy with which we shall have to deal.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that, being in full control of the cables and the wireless, he might have added that it would be possible for him to comply literally and according to its spirit with the provision of the Constitution as to advising with the Senate at every step in making a treaty dealing with the momentous affairs that were being considered by the peace conference at Paris.

Now, Mr. President, I resume where I broke off at the adjournment or the recess taken last evening, when I was presenting to the Senate the conception of President Washington of his obligations, as President, to advise with the Senate in the making of treaties, as shown by the records of his administration. I had completed the recital with respect to one case in which he had advised with the Senate while a treaty was in the making; and again, in addressing the Senate of the United States May 8, 1792, President Washington submitted the following propositions for the advice of the Senate. I quote:

If the President of the United States should conclude a convention or treaty with the Government of Algiers for the ransom of the 13 Americans in captivity there for a sum of not exceeding $40,000, all expenses included, will the Senate approve the same? Or is there any, and what, greater or lesser sum which they would fix on as the limit beyond which they would not approve the ransom?

Continuing the quotation:

If the President of the United States should conclude a treaty with the Government of Algiers for the establishment of peace with them at any expense not exceeding $25,000, paid at the signature, and a like sum to be paid annually afterwards during the continuance of the treaty, would the Senate approve the same? Or are there any greater or lesser sums which they would fix on as the limits beyond which they would not approve of such treaty?

Of course, in all the more important treaties President Washington was equally punctilious in seeking the advice of the Senate, or in associating the Senate with the President in framing the treaty through an agent agreed upon between the President and the Senate. Whenever that course seemed to be the most practical one the Senate was represented in the making of the treaty as much as the President, when they jointly agreed upon the selection of an agent or of agents who should make the treaty.

For example, February 9, 1790, he addressed the Senate as follows:

You will perceive from the papers herewith delivered, and which are enumerated in the annexed list, that a difference subsists between Great Britain and the United States relative to the boundary line between our eastern and their territories. A plan for deciding this difference was laid before the late Congress, and whether that or some other plan of a like kind would not now be eligible is submitted to your consideration.

In my opinion it is desirable that all questions between this and other nations be speedily and amicably settled, and in this instance I think it advisable to postpone any negotiations on the subject until I shall be informed of the result of your deliberations and receive your advice as to the propositions most proper to be offered on the part of the United States.

As I am taking measures for learning the intentions of Great Britain respecting the further detention of our posts, etc., I am the more solicitous that the business now submitted to you may be prepared for negotiation as soon as the other important affairs which engage your attention will permit.

Think of it, sir! President Washington thought it advisable to postpone even opening negotiations until the Senate had deliberated upon the matter and advised him—to quote his own words—"as to the propositions most proper to be offered on the part of the United States"; and because of the great importance and urgency of the question, the President exhorted the Senate that it act as promptly as the other important affairs which engaged its attention would permit, to the end that he might be advised upon the questions submitted to the Senate and the matter—to quote his words—"be prepared for negotiation."

If, sir, it is allowed the spirit of Washington to know the evils that afflict his unhappy country to-day, his thoughts must have been aroused by the spectacle of President Wilson betaking himself to the capitals of Europe, there to negotiate in secret, with the representatives of the Kings of Great Britain and Italy, the Emperor of Japan, and other potentates, a treaty more far-reaching in its consequences to this country than ever before was contemplated by the mind of man; and in all this proceeding the President addressed no communication to the Senate, and not only never sought its advice, but deliberately destroyed all possibility of the Senate advising with the President by refusing to convene it in special session while the peace conference was doing its most important work.

The criticism of the league of nations by Senators during the session which terminated March 4 did constrain the President grudgingly to consent to inviting a few Senators to the White House on his return from abroad February 25, and thus grant to them the special privilege of a brief exchange of views on that branch of the work of the peace conference. The Senators wanted to know the meaning of this provision and that provision. Answers in hazy generalities did not seem to satisfy their desire for information. Questions were delicately pressed by the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, invited to the President's private dinner. The President did not particularly enjoy the occasion. He wasted no more of his time upon the "pygmy minds" of Senators who declined to permit him to do their thinking for them; and manifestly he welcomed the approach of the 4th of March, which automatically adjourned Congress and put a stop to further discussion of the proceedings of the peace conference in the daily sessions of the Senate.

Who, think you, best knew the meaning of the Constitution, George Washington or Woodrow Wilson? Whose interpretation will you accept? That of the great soldier and statesman who presided over the convention that framed the Constitution, and was unanimously elected the first President of the United States, or the schoolmaster who read the Constitution only as 10,000 other professors read it, for classroom purposes, and who by the accident of politics was elected President of the United States?

Sir, not only did President Washington, in his solicitude to obey the Constitution, seek the advice of the Senate in advance upon the principles to be embodied in every treaty made during his administration, but when he found it necessary to appoint some one to conduct the negotiations for him he submitted the names of such persons to the Senate, with his reasons for their selection, and sought the approval of the Senate upon the appointment.

Accordingly, he addressed the Senate on January 11, 1792, respecting the proposed treaty with Spain. After setting out the fact that the representatives of the King of Spain had approached our Government with suggestions that a treaty be made respecting the navigation of the Mississippi River, President Washington said:

In consequence of the communication from the Court of Spain, as stated in the preceding report, I nominate William Carmichael, present chargé d'affaires of the United States at Madrid, and William Short, present chargé d'affaires of the United States at Paris, to be commissioners plenipotentiary for negotiating and concluding with any person or persons who shall be duly authorized by His Catholic Majesty a convention or treaty concerning the navigation of the River Mississippi by the citizens of the United States, saving to the President and Senate their respective rights as to the ratification of the same.

It evidently never occurred to President Washington that the way to make that treaty was to take his family and Col. House, besides some thirteen hundred other friends and associates, and go over to the Court of Spain, and make the treaty all by himself in secret, never communicating with the Senate until the treaty was a completed document, and then merely calling it to the attention of the Senate by pointing out the place where the vote of concurrence of the Senate could be attached.

The several communications addressed by President Washington to the Senate, from which I have quoted, and the many others of the same nature, are to be found, of course, in the published Messages and Papers of the Presidents under the dates I have mentioned.

President Washington not only knew and recognized the constitutional right and duty of the Senate to advise with the President in making treaties, but he also realized the full extent and great responsibility and the limitations imposed upon the treaty-making power vested by the Constitution in the Executive, and he never hesitated to execute that power to the full limit of his constitutional right and duty. No man ever called President Washington a weakling or a man who was afraid to assume responsibility or disposed to surrender the rights and prerogatives of the presidential office. Accordingly we find that when the House of Representatives, in March, 1796, adopted a resolution requesting the President to send to it a copy of the instructions to the minister to negotiate a treaty with the Government of Great Britain, claiming that the carrying out of the treaty would require legislation of the House, President Washington courteously but firmly declined to comply with the request, on the ground that no such duty was enjoined upon him by the Constitution.

In his message to the House of Representatives, Washington pointed out that the House of Representatives was a large body and that the danger of communications of a confidential nature becoming public was much greater than in the case of the Senate, and that this was one reason which moved the convention which framed the Constitution to vest the treaty-making power in the President and the Senate. On this point he said:

The necessity of such caution and secrecy was one cogent reason for vesting the power of making treaties in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, the principle upon which that body was formed confining it to a small number of Senators. To admit, then, a right in the House of Representatives to demand and to have as a matter of course all the papers respecting a negotiation with a foreign power would be to establish a dangerous precedent.

President Washington knew the danger of a bad precedent, and so he adhered firmly to the Constitution, every line of which had been written under his eye, and every sentence of which had been most ably debated in his presence, neither seeking, on the one hand, an undue extension of the President's treaty-making power nor, on the other hand, allowing that power to be in the slightest degree limited or impaired.

I can not, of course, Mr. President, take the time of the Senate to go over all the many instances in which other Presidents, in conformity with the Constitution, have sought the advice of the Senate to or during the negotiations of a treaty, or have joined with the Senate in the selection of an agent or commission to make the treaty. I have dwelt at some length upon the practice followed by Washington because his position in the Constitutional Convention puts it beyond question that he knew the meaning of the framers of the Constitution—the meaning that they gave to the clause I am discussing.

The practice of all the early Presidents, particularly those who had some part in the framing of the Constitution, was the same. They sought the advice of the Senate concerning any proposed treaty at some point prior to the time the treaty was submitted for final action. While I am aware that subsequently this practice was departed from, it is also true that it has been generally followed in exceptional cases when necessary to enable the Senate to advise the President in the constitutional sense.

Passing rapidly over the different administrations, I note that President Adams's practice was exactly the same as Washington's. Let one instance suffice.

In negotiating a treaty with the French Republic, the President laid before the Senate a general statement of the ground covered, and submitted to the Senate for confirmation the names of the agents he desired to select to conduct the negotiations. Addressing the Senate under date of May 31, 1797, he said:

I nominate Gen. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, of South Carolina; Francis Dana, chief justice of the State of Massachusetts; and Gen. John Marshall, of Virginia, to be jointly and severally envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the French Republic.

After mature deliberation on the critical situation of our relations with France, which have long engaged my most serious attention, I have determined on these nominations of persons to negotiate with the French Republic to dissipate umbrages, to remove prejudices, to rectify errors, and adjust all differences by a treaty between the two powers.

It is, in the present critical and singular circumstances, of great importance to engage the confidence of the great portions of the Union in the characters employed and the measures which may be adopted. I have therefore thought it expedient to nominate persons of talents and integrity, long known in the three great divisions of the Union, and at the same time to provide against the cases of death, absence, indisposition, or other impediments to invest any one or more of them with full powers.

So much for President Adams.

President Jefferson, it is well known, maintained, and while Secretary of State advised the President, that the Senate should be consulted before the opening of negotiations respecting a treaty, since it was for that body to finally concur in the treaty. I cite the writings of Jefferson, Ford Edition, fifth volume, page 442.

If the requirements of secret diplomacy which were so much affected by statesmen throughout the world in the nineteenth century sometimes led our Presidents to conduct treaty negotiations with too little regard for the letter and spirit of the Constitution, that was merely the occasion for the really great Presidents to respect the principles of the Constitution, and return to the practice of Washington and his immediate successors.

Accordingly we find that President Jackson, under date of May 6, 1830, sought the advice of the Senate concerning a proposed treaty with the Choctaw Indians, by which they offered to cede to the United States all their country east of the Mississippi River. Among other things, he said:

It is certainly desirable, on various and very pressing accounts, as will appear from the accompanying documents, that some agreement should be concluded with the Indians by which an object so important as their removal beyond the territorial limits of the States may be effected.

In settling the terms of such an agreement, I am disposed to exercise the utmost liberality, and to concur in any which are consistent with the Constitution and not incompatible with the interests of the United States and their duties to the Indians. I can not, however, regard the terms proposed by the Choctaws to be in all respects of this character; but, desirous of concluding an agreement upon such as are, I have drawn up the accompanying amendments, which I propose to offer to the Choctaws if they meet the approbation of the Senate. The conditions which they offer are such as, in my judgment, the most likely to be acceptable to both parties, and are liable to the fewest objections. Not being tenacious, though, on the subject, I will most cheerfully adopt any modifications which on a frank interchange of opinions my constitutional advisers may suggest, and which I shall be satisfied are reconcilable with my official duties.

With these views I ask the opinion of the Senate upon the following questions:

Will the Senate advise the conclusion of a treaty with the Choctaw Nation according to the terms which they propose? Or will the Senate advise the conclusion of a treaty with that tribe as modified by the alterations suggested by me?

If not, what further alteration or modification will the Senate propose?

Lincoln, too, in negotiating treaties, conformed strictly to the Constitution and followed the practice of early Presidents. One of Lincoln's first acts was to ask the advice of the Senate on a proposition submitted by the British Government to refer certain matters in controversy between the two countries to arbitration. In his communication, under date of March 16, 1861, President Lincoln said:

The Senate has transmitted to me a copy of the message sent by my predecessor to that body on the 21st day of February last, proposing to take its advice on the subject of a proposition made by the British Government through its minister here, to refer the matter in controversy between that Government and the Government of the United States to the arbitrament of the King of Sweden and Norway, the King of the Netherlands, or the Republic of the Swiss Confederation.

In that message my predecessor stated that he wished to submit to the Senate the precise questions following, namely:

Will the Senate approve a treaty referring to either of the foreign powers above named the dispute now existing between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain concerning the boundary line between Vancouver Island and the American Continent? In case the referee shall find himself unable to decide where the line is by the description of it in the treaty of the 15th June, 1846, shall he be authorized to establish a line according to the treaty as nearly as possible? Which of the three powers named by Great Britain as an arbiter shall be chosen by the United States?

I find no reason to disapprove of the course of my predecessor in this important matter; but, on the contrary, I not only shall receive the advice of the Senate therein cheerfully, but I respectfully ask the Senate for their advice on the three questions before recited.

The predecessor of Mr. Lincoln referred to in his message was, of course, Mr. Buchanan. His views on the subject had been stated while Secretary of State, in 1846, in instructions given to Mr. McLean, Minister to Great Britain. He there said, and I quote from President Buchanan now:

The Federal Constitution has made the Senate to a certain extent a coordinate branch of the treaty-making power. Without their advice and consent no treaty can be concluded. This power could not be intrusted to wiser or better hands. Besides, in their legislative character they constitute a portion of the war-making as in their executive capacity they compose a part of the treaty-making power. * * * A rejection of the British ultimatum might probably lead to war, and as a branch of the legislative power it would be incumbent upon them to authorize the necessary preparations to render this war successful. Under these considerations the President, in deference to the Senate—and to the true theory of the constitutional responsibilities of the different branches of the Government, will forego his own opinion so far as to submit to that body any proposition which may be made by the British Government not, in his judgment, wholly inconsistent with the rights and honor of the country.

Listen, now, to this—

President Buchanan also during his administration followed this practice, and on February 21, 1861, sought the advice of the Senate in advance of negotiations for a treaty to refer to arbitration the northwest boundary dispute.

Resuming for a moment reference to Lincoln's administration and to the practices which he followed, on July 19 President Lincoln submitted to the Senate for its advice, with a view to formal ratification, the draft of a treaty formally agreed upon between the United States and the Delaware Tribe of Indians relative to certain lands of the tribe.

On December 17, 1861, President Lincoln transmitted to the Senate for advice a copy of a draft for a convention with the Republic of Mexico, by Mr. Corwin, then minister to that Government. He urged the immediate consideration by the Senate, because of the momentous interests of the two Governments at this juncture.

On January 24, 1862, President Lincoln sent a message to the Senate laying before it a dispatch just then received from Minister Corwin. It contained important information concerning the war then being waged against Mexico by Spain, France, and Great Britain. The President asked that the Senate give early consideration to the request which he had previously submitted to the Senate, to the end that he might cause instructions to be sent to Mr. Corwin, such instructions as would enable him to act in a manner which, while it would most carefully guard the interests of our country, would at the same time be most beneficial to Mexico.

In this connection I wish to read a communication from President Lincoln to the Senate:

WASHINGTON, June 23, 1862.

To the Senate of the United States:

On the 7th day of December, 1861, I submitted to the Senate the project of a treaty between the United States and Mexico, which had been proposed to me by Mr. Corwin, our minister to Mexico, and respectfully requested the advice of the Senate thereupon.

On the 25th day of February last a resolution was adopted by the Senate to the effect "that it is not advisable to negotiate a treaty that will require the United States to assume any portion of the principal or interest of the debt of Mexico, or that will require the concurrence of European powers."

This resolution having been duly communicated to me, notice thereof was immediately given by the Secretary of State to Mr. Corwin, and he was informed that he was to consider his instructions upon the subject referred to modified by this resolution and would govern his course accordingly.

That dispatch failed to reach Mr. Corwin, by reason of the disturbed condition of Mexico, until a very recent date, Mr. Corwin being without instructions, or thus practically left without instructions, to negotiate further with Mexico.

In view of the very important events occurring there, he has thought that the interests of the United States would be promoted by the conclusion of two treaties, which should provide for a loan to that Republic. He has, therefore, signed such treaties, and they having been duly ratified by the Government of Mexico, he has transmitted them to me for my consideration. The action of the Senate is, of course, conclusive against an acceptance of the treaties on my part. I have nevertheless thought it just to our excellent minister in Mexico and respectful to the Government of that Republic to lay the treaties before the Senate, together with the correspondence which has occurred in relation to them. In performing this duty I have only to add that the importance of the subject thus submitted to the Senate can not be overestimated, and I shall cheerfully receive and consider with the highest respect any further advice the Senate may think proper to give upon the subject.

On March 5, 1862, President Lincoln submitted to the Senate a copy of a message addressed to them by President Buchanan relating to the award made by a joint commission under the convention between the United States and Paraguay, together with the original journal of the proceedings of the commission, and requested the advice of the Senate as to the final acquiescence in or rejection of the award of the commission by the Government of the United States. He requested also that the Senate return the journal, as it was a document which should be returned to the custody of the Secretary of State.

Oh, Mr. President, compare that with the denial of the present Executive made again and again to the Senate to have put into its possession anything approaching memoranda of the proceedings of this peace commission that transacted this important business at Versailles, to aid the Senate in considering this treaty. All, everything pertaining to the daily discussion of the different terms of this great document, so far-reaching in its consequences, withheld from the Senate that must be bound by its concurrence therein, not to speak of the treaties that are bound up with this treaty and with the league covenant, to which the Senate, when it concurs, if it ever should, in this document, bind this country as to the other documents withheld from the Senate.

Mr. President, I undertake to say that in all the history of governments which are even an approach to a democratic form of government, there never has been such an exhibition of autocratic power as that to which this body has submitted at the hands of the present Executive.

President Johnson, following the footsteps of his immediate predecessors, on January 15, 1869, asked the advice of the Senate concerning the proposed naturalization treaty with Great Britain in conformity with the London protocol of October 9, 1868.

President Grant adopted the same course. In the communication to the Senate under date of May 18, 1872, he said:

I transmit herewith the correspondence which has recently taken place respecting the differences of opinion which have arisen between this Government and that of Great Britain with regard to the powers of the tribunal of arbitration created under the treaty signed at Washington May 8, 1871.

I respectfully invite the attention of the Senate to the proposed article submitted by the British Government with the object of removing the differences which seem to threaten the prosecution of the arbitration and request an expression by the Senate of their disposition in regard to advising and consenting to the formal adoption of an article such as is proposed by the British Government.

The Senate is aware that consultation with that body in advance of entering into agreements with foreign states has many precedents. In the early days of the Republic, Gen. Washington repeatedly asked their advice upon pending questions with such powers. The most important recent precedent is that of the Oregon boundary treaty in 1846.

The importance of the results hanging upon the present state of the treaty with Great Britain leads me to follow these former precedents and to desire the counsel of the Senate in advance of agreeing to the proposal of Great Britain.

President Arthur followed the same practice, and on June 9, 1884, submitted to the Senate in advance of any negotiations a proposal from the ruler of the Hawaiian Islands to extend the reciprocity agreement then in force for a period of seven years.

In very recent years the proposed treaties have often been dealt with by the Presidents in annual or general messages instead of special messages, and the whole matter opened in that way for general discussion between the President and the Senate for a complete understanding.

Treaty negotiations have often been begun by the Executive in response either to joint or Senate resolutions advising such negotiations.

Such was the resolution of March 4, 1909, requesting the President to renew negotiations with Russia concerning the treatment of American citizens in Russia.

So also in some instances Presidents have designated as commissioners to negotiate treaties Members of the Senate and of the Foreign Relations Committee, as in the case of the commissioners appointed by President McKinley September 13, 1898, to negotiate the treaty of peace with Spain. It will be remembered—indeed, I think there are a number of Members of the Senate to-day who were then Members of the Senate—that President McKinley at that time gave to the Senate a majority of the membership of the commission that negotiated the treaty with Spain. The membership of that commission was as follows: William R. Day, late Secretary of State, chairman of the commission; Cushman K. Davis, Senator, and at that time chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations; William P. Frye, Senator, and also a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations; George Gray, Senator, and a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations at that time; Whitelaw Reid, late minister plenipotentiary of the United States to France. That was the commission that negotiated the treaty with Spain at the conclusion of the War with Spain in 1898.

That was in a marked degree a recognition of the Senate as a concrete authority and power in the making of treaties. The practice, I believe, has been uniform, or practically uniform, for the Presidents to transmit to the Senate information concerning any proposed treaty in response to a resolution of the Senate requesting it. Where the treaty has come before the Senate in a completed form for its action without having been previously advised with by the Executive, the Senate has never hesitated—unless this shall make the first record of that sort—to reject the treaty if it was deemed objectionable. For example, the Senate refused concurrence in proposed treaties with Great Britain in January, 1869; June, 1886; February, 1888; and January, 1897.

It will serve no good purpose, Mr. President, to go over the long list of treaties which have been rejected by the Senate which came to it for consideration for the first time in completed form, because it is a fact of history that the Presidents after a time, particularly when our Government had passed beyond the influence of the period of the making of the Constitution, began to reach out for more and more executive power. It is sufficient to say that whenever an Executive has assumed that the situation was such that the advice of the Senate could be obtained by submitting the treaty in completed form for its consideration without previous conference, the Senate has in such cases invariably insisted upon the right to the same freedom of action as it would have possessed had it been consulted at an earlier stage of the negotiations.

I shall not attempt to exhaust the precedents upon this subject, nor would it serve any useful purpose to do so. It is not to be expected that through a period of almost a century and a half and the administration of 27 different Presidents there would be perfect uniformity on all occasions; but, to the great credit of all previous Presidents, be it said that through the administrations of nearly all runs a clear recognition of the constitutional mandate to advise with the Senate in making a treaty.

The policy of our greatest Presidents has been to seek the advice of the Senate concerning a proposed treaty in advance of negotiations, where that was feasible. In many instances, of course, that has not been feasible and has not been done. In many instances the will of the Senate and the wishes of the parties to the treaty were well known and the interests of the United States were perfectly clear. In such cases few, if any, doubtful questions were involved in the negotiation of the treaty, and the advice of the Senate could be freely given upon the completed draft of the document, which, however, if found faulty could be amended or rejected without in any way jeopardizing the interests of the country. But the rule to be deduced from all the precedents, and which is expressed so clearly in the Constitution as hardly to require the citation of authorities, is that the President is bound to advise with the Senate at some stage in the process of making a treaty which will leave the Senate free to give its advice solely on the merits of the proposed treaty, and when the President is free to accept and act upon the advice which the Senate gives him.

I concede, of course, Mr. President, that there is no power in the Senate to compel the President to do that; and many of the text writers upon this subject have treated it just from that standpoint alone in discussing the question of the power of the Senate to compel the President to advise with the Senate in the making of a treaty. Of course, the Senate has no other power over the Executive than the power of impeachment upon articles presented by the House of Representatives, and a critical and close reading, I think, of the discussion that has been had shows that it is directed chiefly to that point.

No other interpretation than that which I have given, as it seems to me, of the Constitution is possible if this language is to be understood in its plain, ordinary sense, and no other interpretation is possible, in view of the construction which, by their official acts, Washington and the other Presidents of the country, particularly those who caught the spirit of the Constitutional Convention from the time in which they lived, have placed upon it. What I have said is the very least that any President can do in advising with the Senate in making treaties and still claim to have obeyed the Constitution, and particularly when treaties relate to changes in the very substructure of this Government.

Sir, has President Wilson, in conducting the negotiations respecting the treaty now before the Senate, obeyed either the letter or the spirit of the Constitution, or has he violated both? Did he ask the advice of the Senate upon this most far-reaching treaty ever negotiated since the world began, at a stage of the negotiations where the Senate was free to discharge its constitutional duty of considering this treaty upon its merits and advising the President accordingly? We all know that he did not. We all know, moreover, that he deliberately and for months after he had started negotiations refused to call the Senate into session in order that neither by resolution nor otherwise could it seek information or make suggestions concerning the negotiation of this treaty which the President was then conducting in person in a foreign land. The Senate, of course, could not convene itself; and so for many weeks he avoided even the criticism of not taking into his confidence the coordinate treaty-making branch of the Government.

When the exigencies of the United States, of course, required the calling of a special session, the President still in no way recognized his constitutional duty to advise with the Senate or to permit it to have any information concerning the amazing covenants, undermining the sovereign rights of this Government, or to know anything about the enormous burdens imposed upon it, or to have an intimation of the base surrender of the professed principles and high purposes for which the American people have been persuaded to believe that they were sacrificing priceless lives in fighting a foreign war.

Why did President Wilson take this course? There is but one answer. He knew that he was engaged in framing a treaty many provisions of which were as shocking to the moral sense of the people of this country as they are to a majority of the Senate, and he knew that if knowledge of those conditions came to the Senate, the Senate, whether its advice were sought or not, would by resolution or otherwise advise the President and his associates in Paris who were framing this treaty that the Senate would never concur in a treaty containing monstrous provisions which undermine the independence and sovereignty of this Government.

Suppose, sir, the President had informed the Senate that the shameful secret treaties between the Allies, partitioning the world between themselves as spoils of war, were to be carried out by the terms of the treaty about to be made and asked the advice of the Senate thereon; we all know what the result would have been. The Senate, sir, would have with practical unanimity advised the President that the Senate would never concur in such an infamous treaty of spoliation, which would have inevitably disgraced and dishonored this Nation.

I say, sir, that the Senate would have taken this action with practical unanimity, for I assume that there is not a Senator here whose self-respect and sense of decency would have permitted him to have taken any other course. That was the situation which the Constitution required the President to advise with the Senate. Then the Senate would have been under no compulsion; it would have been free to have advised the President of its real thought and honest judgment, and the President in turn must have communicated the judgment of the Senate to the other members of the conference, and the objectionable provisions would never have been written into the treaty; or, if they had been written into it, it would have been with full notice that the treaty would be rejected by the Senate.

Suppose, sir, that during the course of the negotiations in Paris President Wilson had informed the Senate that it was proposed to write into the treaty a provision that Great Britain should have six times the voting strength of the United States in this league which was being formed, and asked the advice of the Senate upon that proposition. It would be an insult to every Member of the Senate to suggest that there would have been any dissent from the indignant declaration this body would have promptly transmitted to the President declaring its unalterable opposition to concurring in any such provision in the treaty.

Suppose, sir, the President from his secluded retreat at Versailles had informed the Senate that they proposed to put a provision in this treaty which would rob China, a sister republic and one of the allies in the war, of an area of territory larger than England, with incalculable wealth and great military importance, and turn it over to Japan. Why, sir, we can hardly imagine the indignation with which so monstrous a proposition would have been rejected by the Senate.

Mr. President, I might stand here and enumerate proposition after proposition in this document which shocks the moral sense of any rational mind, every one of which the Senate would unhesitatingly have advised the President should never find place in this treaty.

Why is it, Mr. President, that this was not the course pursued? Every person in this Chamber knows the answer. It was because the President was determined that the Senate should have no opportunity to express itself concerning this treaty or any of its shameful provisions until such time as he could coerce the Senate into taking the action he desired by holding over it the threat that, if the treaty was amended in any particular, peace would be indefinitely postponed.

I do not know whether the President was moved to take this course by anything other than a sincere but misguided conviction that he was really acting for the best interests of the people of the United States in signing this treaty, a large portion of which no man has ever undertaken to defend. I do not know to what extent, if any, an ambition to see himself the first president of the league of nations dulled his appreciation of the injustice involved in this treaty; but I can not conceive of a normal man, under normal conditions, who, being duly regardful of his responsibilities, could bring himself to set his hand and seal to the indefensible provisions of this treaty.

What the President's ambitions or what his motives and purposes were is immaterial. The course which he deliberately chose to take concerning this treaty, by which the Senate was deprived of all possibility of advising him respecting its terms until the Senate could be coerced, by the fear of continuing a state of war, into accepting the treaty, though contrary to its judgment, is just as much a violation of the Constitution as it would have been for the President to refuse to submit the treaty to the Senate at all.

The Constitution, when it required the President to advise with the Senate, intended in the first place that that advice should represent the deliberate, free thought and judgment of the Senate, and in the second place it was intended that it should be received at a time when the President was free to act upon it. The President so managed the negotiations respecting this treaty as to defeat the entire constitutional provision. He has proceeded exactly as though there was no requirement of the Constitution that he should advise with the Senate on the subject at all. He has gone even further than that. He has proceeded in such a manner as to render it impossible for the Senate to advise with him effectively upon the subject, and also in such a manner as to compel the Senate to concur in the treaty or else leave the country still in a state of war. Every Senator knows that if this treaty is ratified without fundamental and far-reaching amendments it will be done not because a majority of the Senate are not in favor of such amendments, but because they are ready to forego the amendments in order to have peace formally declared. They have been placed by the President in a position where they must say to their constituents and to the country: "This is a shameful treaty, but the President left us no choice but to approve it or continue in a state of war. Of the two evils, we chose that which seemed to us the lesser." That, sir, in the last analysis is the whole of the argument which will prevail if this treaty is concurred in.

It would be an insult to the memory of the wise and patriotic men who framed our Constitution to suppose that they ever intended that the great treaty-making power with which they endowed the Senate should be so prostituted as to become merely a means of registering the President's will. We know that nothing of the sort was intended by the framers of the Constitution, and the language of the Constitution permits no such construction. Nothing of the sort can happen if Senators perform their sworn duty under the Constitution, no matter what are the desires and ambitions which move the President.

I am not arguing that a good treaty should be rejected or amended merely because a President disregarded the Constitution in refusing to advise with the Senate concerning it; but I do say that any treaty which comes into the Senate under such a cloud should be regarded with suspicion. The presumption is against it.

In the present case, however, the iniquities of the treaty are admitted. The ratification of this treaty is not demanded upon its merits, but only because its ratification is believed by some to be the lesser of two evils.

Mr. President, if the Senate meets its responsibilities and discharges its constitutional duty, this treaty will be either materially amended or it will be rejected so decisively that no President in the future will ever attempt to make a treaty involving matters of supreme importance in our international relations, to say nothing of an attempt to reconstruct our Government, without at least advising with the Senate in his monumental undertaking.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in view of the very fierce attack made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] yesterday and to-day on the President of the United States, charging him with having violated the Constitution of the United States in failing to take the advice of the Senate with respect to the treaty with Germany, I read from volume 1 of Willoughby on the Constitution, section 192, particular reference being made, in the extract which I shall read, to the experience of President Washington, to which reference has been made by the Senator in his remarks:

> With respect to the manner in which treaty making is, according to the Constitution, to be conducted, the first question that arises is as to the extent to which the Senate may properly participate not only in the ratification but in the preliminary negotiation of international agreements.
> In the same clause, indeed in the same sentence, of the Constitution in which provision is made for entering into treaties it is provided that the President "shall nominate and, by and with the advice of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls," etc. Here the phraseology shows that the act of nominating the public officials mentioned is clearly distinguished from their appointment. They are to be nominated by the President, but to be appointed by the Senate and President. The negotiating of treaties is not, however, by the phraseology of the treaty clause thus sharply distinguished from their ratification as regards the Federal organs by which this negotiation and ratification is to be performed. The language is that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties," not that "he shall negotiate and, with the consent of the Senate, ratify treaties."
> As further indicative of an intended participation of the Senate in the negotiation of treaties is the fact, already adverted to, that in the convention, until almost the last moment, it was agreed that the treaty-making power should be vested exclusively in the Senate, a body the membership of which at that time it was thought would remain comparatively small.
> Actual practice exhibits frequent instances in which the Senate has participated in the negotiation of treaties.
> During the first years under the Constitution the relations between the President and the Senate were especially close. In 1789 President Washington notified the Senate that he would confer with them with reference to a treaty with certain of the Indian tribes and on the next day, and again two days later, went with Gen. Knox before that body for that purpose.
>
> Again, in 1790, President Washington, in a written communication, asked the advice of the Senate as to a new boundary treaty to be entered into with the Cherokees. So, also, in 1791, he asked the Senate to advise him as to what answer to be made to the French chargé d'affaires with regard to a question of tonnage on foreign vessels.
> John Quincy Adams in his memoirs relates that Crawford told him that Washington went to the Senate with a draft of a treaty; that "they debated it and proposed alterations, so that when Washington left the Senate Chamber he said he would be damned if he ever went there again. And ever since that time treaties have been negotiated by the Executive before submitting them to the consideration of the Senate."
>
> In fact, however, the Presidents did continue occasionally to consult with the Senate in regard to the negotiation of treaties.
> In 1794, when sending the name of John Jay as envoy extraordinary to England, Washington explained to the Senate his purpose in doing so, and the same was done by President Adams in 1797 when nominating the special commission to France.
> After the first few years under the Constitution, however, the practice on the part of the President of consulting the Senate with regard to the treaties to be negotiated, became an infrequent one, but yet not one wholly obsolete. Thus, in 1818, President Monroe asked the Senate whether he alone as Executive was constitutionally competent to arrange with Great Britain as to naval armaments upon the Great Lakes; and, if not, that they should give him advice as to the proper agreement with reference thereto, that should be entered into. Again, in 1830, President Jackson asked the advice of the Senate as to the terms of a treaty to be negotiated with the Choctaw Indians. His message, however, bears evidence to the fact that he is aware that he is departing from the practice of years immediately preceding, though not from that of the early period. He says: "I am aware that in thus resorting to the early practice of the Government, by asking the previous advice of the Senate in the discharge of this portion of my duties, I am departing from a long, and, for many years, unbroken usage in similar cases. But being satisfied that this resort is consistent with the provisions of the Constitution, that it is strongly recommended in this instance by considerations of expediency, and that the reasons which have led to the observance of a different practice, though very cogent in negotiations with foreign nations, do not apply with equal force to those made with Indian tribes, I flatter myself that it will not meet with the disapprobation of the Senate."
> In the article already referred to Senator LODGE enumerates a not inconsiderable number of instances down to comparatively recent times in which the Senate has participated in the negotiation of treaties.
> In a number of cases the Senate has by resolution suggested to the President that certain negotiations be initiated.

I read no further, Mr. President, except to say that the author agrees, as all who have inquired into the subject agree, that the practice is altogether exceptional, and that the rule is that the President does not confer with the Senate with regard to treaties until they have actually been negotiated.

I do not read from the volume before me for the purpose of refuting the able argument of the Senator from Wisconsin, but merely to show that the crime, if it be a crime, laid by him at the door of the President of the United States, is one which practically every President of the United States from Washington down has been guilty of. I do not need to say, Mr. President, that in this particular instance the President of the United States might not commendably have taken the Senate more freely into his confidence. I assert, however, that he was entirely within his constitutional rights, as the Constitution has been construed from the very earliest days of our history down to the present time, in the course he has taken.

Mr. President, I desire to submit another reference in this connection. There was at one time a Member of this body from the State of the Senator who has indulged in these animadversions upon the President of the United States who had no little distinction as an expositor of the Constitution. I refer to the late Senator John C. Spooner, from the State of Wisconsin. He had occasion to inquire into this matter, and had something to say about it on the 23d day of January, 1906. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, as follows:

> The Senate has nothing whatever to do with the negotiation of treaties or the conduct of our foreign intercourse and relations save the exercise of the one constitutional function of "advice and consent," which the Constitution requires as a precedent condition to the making of a treaty. Except as to the participation in the treaty-making power the Senate under the Constitution has obviously neither responsibilities nor power.

And then, being interrogated by a Senator as to what significance he gave to the words "advice and consent," as used in the Constitution, he said:

> The words "advice and consent of the Senate" are used in the Constitution with reference to the Senate's participation in the making of a treaty and are well translated by the word "ratification" popularly used in this connection. The President negotiates the treaty, to begin with. He may employ such agencies as he chooses to negotiate the proposed treaty. He may employ the ambassador, if there be one, or a minister or a chargé d'affaires, or he may use a person in private life whom he thinks by his skill or knowledge of the language or the people of the country with which he is about to deal is best fitted to negotiate the treaty. He may issue to the agent chosen by him—and neither Congress nor the Senate has any concern as to whom he chooses—such instructions as seem to him wise. He may vary them from day to day. That is his concern. The Senate has no right to demand that he shall unfold to the world or to it, even in executive session, his instructions or the prospect or progress of the negotiation. I said "right." I used that word advisedly in order to illustrate what all men who have studied the subject are willing to concede, that the Constitution, the absolute power of negotiation, is in the President and the means of negotiation subject wholly to his will and his judgment.
> When he shall have negotiated and sent his proposed treaty to the Senate the jurisdiction of this body attaches and its power begins. It may advise and consent or it may refuse. And in the exercise of this function it is as independent of the Executive as he is independent of it in the matter of negotiation.

The views thus expressed by the eminent Senator were very warmly indorsed by the present senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

I believe, Mr. President, that at this stage of our history it is a little late to discuss the question as to whether the President of the United States violates the Constitution by submitting to the Senate a treaty for its advice and consent without having communicated with it during the course of negotiations. Mr. President, it does not make a bit of difference, so far as the crime is concerned, whether the treaties negotiated by a President of the United States without conferring with the Senate during the process of negotiations were important or unimportant. If the construction is correct that he violates the Constitution when he does not do so, it is entirely irrelevant whether he neglected to do it in the case of unimportant, even trivial treaties. It can not be contended, either, that the Presidents in the past have neglected to do so only in the case of unimportant treaties. In fact, quite the contrary has been the rule.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, supplementing briefly the statement which has just been made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], I desire to call attention to some remarks made by the Senator from Ohio, Mr. Sherman, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the Senate on August 7, 1888, which, I think, correctly state the power of the President in connection with the negotiation of treaties. He said:

> The President of the United States has the power to propose treaties subject to ratification by the Senate, and he may use such agencies as he chooses to employ, except that he can not take any money from the Treasury to pay those agents without an appropriation by law. He can use such instruments as he pleases.

That excerpt is taken from a statement made by Mr. Sherman on August 7, 1888. It has been apparent, during the course of this debate, that there is an implied, if not an expressed, criticism of the President for his failure to appoint members of the peace commission. There are three distinct proceedings in the making of a treaty—the negotiation, the advice and consent by the Senate, and the exchange of ratifications. The first and the last—the negotiation of the treaty and the exchange of ratifications—are, according to all the authorities with which I am familiar, exclusively executive functions.

I do not express an opinion as to the wisdom of the policy pursued by the President in failing to include Senators as representatives of this Government at the peace conference, but merely remark that the proceedings in the Senate—the debates—disclose that upon the part of some Senators, at least, he could not have secured sincere cooperation and assistance in the preparation of any treaty of peace which might have been acceptable to the Senate, and if the disagreements that have been expressed in the Senate as to what the treaty should contain had been reflected in the peace conference it is probable that the resurrection would have occurred before any treaty would have been successfully negotiated and submitted to the Senate.

The very eminent authority referred to by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] made another statement, in addition to that read by the Senator from Montana, which I take the liberty of reading into the RECORD as reenforcing the argument and position of the Senator from Montana. Mr. John C. Spooner made the declaration in the Senate on January 26, 1906:

> The President is so supreme under the Constitution in the matter of treaties, excluding only the Senate's ratification, that he may negotiate a treaty, he may send it to the Senate, it may receive by way of "advice and consent" the unanimous judgment of the Senate that it is in the highest degree for the public interest, and yet the President is as free, when it is sent back to the White House with resolutions of ratification attached, to put it in his desk never again to see the light of day as he was free to determine in the first instance whether he would or would not negotiate it. That the power is not expressly given to the President by the Constitution, but it inheres in the executive power conferred upon him to conduct our foreign relations, and it is a power which inheres in him as the sole organ under the Constitution through whom our foreign relations and diplomatic intercourse are conducted.

Thus, Mr. President, it appears that the duty devolves upon the Executive to negotiate a treaty and to make exchange of ratifications.

Senators who spend their time day after day in bitter denunciation of the President of the United States for his failure to consult them and to procure in advance their advice concerning the discharge of his functions may well attempt in the same connection to satisfy the country that they are efficiently discharging their constitutional functions. During the last six months two important measures, and only two, outside of the great appropriation bills, have been before the Senate of the United States. The first is the treaty of peace, and now, in an hour when the session is drawing to a close, it appears probable that final action may not be taken on the treaty, that there may be a failure to finally dispose of that all-important subject during the present session.

The other important question is the disposition of the railroads now under Federal control. We have sat here month after month and listened to the recitation of arguments with which we are all familiar. There is not a Senator in this Chamber or outside of it who does not know that the argument which we make here now will not influence or change the votes of Senators on the important questions relating to this treaty. Yet we are preventing the Congress from considering and disposing of other important subjects, including the railroad question, by constantly holding in front of it this subject, the treaty of peace, which should have been ratified long ago.

I believe in freedom of debate, and so long as any Senator fairly believes that he can impress his viewpoint upon his colleagues, debate may well continue, but day after day, week after week, we have heard the same arguments repeated over and over, and now in a few days the session will close, and there is a probability, a possibility if not a probability, that it will expire without a single important act having passed the Congress.

The responsibility for legislation now is primarily upon the other side of this Chamber—upon the majority. If they want to assume responsibility for holding up the final disposition of the treaty of peace, if they want to assume the responsibility for failing to consider and determine the railroad question, let them do so. But this country will know where that responsibility rests, and the majority must bear that responsibility. They can not, they shall not, escape it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. No; I am going to suggest the absence of a quorum, as I want to have the pending amendment disposed of.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I simply desire to ask to have a reprint of Document 139, which is supposed to be a compendium of reservations, so that it may be correct up to date, and include the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations the last session, and also all other reservations that have been offered.

Mr. LODGE. The others are not in the document?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not the others.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the request.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I simply desire to have it brought up to date, and to include all reservations pending at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMOOT in the chair). Without objection, the request of the Senator from Nebraska is granted.

Mr. LODGE. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I hope we can now take a vote upon it. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	McCumber	Simmons
Ball	Gronna	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Hale	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Harris	McNary	Smith, Md.
Calder	Harrison	Moses	Smith, S. C.
Capper	Henderson	Nelson	Smoot
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	New	Spencer
Colt	Johnson, Calif.	Newberry	Sterling
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Sutherland
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Swanson
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Thomas
Dial	Kellogg	Owen	Townsend
Dillingham	Kendrick	Page	Trammell
Edge	Keyes	Phipps	Underwood
Elkins	King	Pittman	Wadsworth
Fall	Kirby	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Fernald	Knox	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	La Follette	Reed	Warren
France	Lenroot	Robinson	Watson
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Sheppard	Williams
Gay	McCormick	Sherman	Wolcott

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. LODGE. That is the last amendment to be offered that I am aware of.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order that the request comes too late.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then we will take time to present it in the Senate later, and will have a roll call on it there.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator from Alabama will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent for a reconsideration of the vote just taken.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing to have the vote taken by yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to a reconsideration?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Chair have the amendment read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, line 5, at the end of the first paragraph of article 12 of the covenant of the league of nations, after the words "they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council," insert the following: "and not then until an advisory vote of the people shall have been taken"; so that the first paragraph of article 12 will read:

> The members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council, and not then until an advisory vote of the people shall have been taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment was rejected shall be reconsidered. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator allow me to say that a request for the yeas and nays was pending; that I made it yesterday at the time I concluded my remarks?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is true. I think the yeas and nays were requested by the Senator from Oklahoma at the time he concluded his remarks. I am not sure whether they had been ordered or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that he is informed that the yeas and nays were requested, but had not been ordered.

Mr. REED. I yield for the purpose of having that request presented at this time.

Mr. GRONNA. Upon the amendment now pending I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want just enough time to explain the vote I intend to cast upon this amendment.

Ordinarily I do not believe in the doctrine that war shall never be declared except after a referendum vote. I believe that proposition is impracticable. I believe that when nations are called upon to act in some great emergency they must generally act quickly and that there is no time for a referendum vote. Indeed, the life of a nation may be sacrificed by a delay of a few hours. The great wars of history have demonstrated that they are not arranged, like prize fights, days in advance, with all arrangements made and an audience invited. Some nations strike quickly, and because that occurs, or is likely to occur, it is absolutely necessary that any sovereign nation shall have reserved to its government, in some of its branches, the right to determine when and how the nation shall strike or act in a great emergency.

Whoever has perused the history of great wars knows that it may be said with practical certainty that there never has been a great war when the very conditions to which I have referred have not obtained. If I remember correctly, Japan attacked Russia and sunk a part of Russia's fleet before she even declared war at all. If you undertook to apply to the last war the ridiculous—and it is to me ridiculous—proposition of a referendum vote, you would find that while the rest of the countries were voting Germany would have been marching.

Of course, a referendum vote, if it applied to every nation and would be observed by every nation, would be quite a different thing; but as the world is constituted today and as the world will be constituted even if the covenant of the league of nations is adopted, it still remains true that any nation at any moment might disregard these obligations, if we were to write them into the league of nations itself, and prepare to strike some other nation. No man can say what the circumstances will be. While one nation is voting another nation will be capturing its citadels, landing its troops on its soil, and closing its ports.

Of course, if we can bring all the nations of the world into a society of nations; if we can set up a supergovernment; if that supergovernment is going to control; and if everybody is going to observe the conditions of the agreement, then it may be all right to agree never to fight until we vote; but we ought to add to that that we will not fight after we have voted; that we will settle everything without war.

Here is the anomaly that is presented to-day to the world by this treaty or this compact: It proposes that we shall settle all wars, and yet it provides for war. It pretends that we are going to create an organization that will end war, and yet it directly specifies the terms and the conditions upon which war can be made even among members of the league. A question is submitted for decision to the council or to the assembly which involves a dispute between two nations, and if there is not a unanimous vote in the council and a unanimous vote in the assembly of the members of the council plus a majority vote of the other members of the assembly, then any nation is at perfect liberty to make war if it sees fit. There is a delay of three months specified.

Now, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] seeks to add to that clause the proposition of a vote, and I believe that his proposition of a referendum to the people is logical as attached to that clause. I am going to vote for it as an amendment to that clause, because I think it is consistent with it; but if it stood alone as a naked proposition to be submitted to the nations of the world, I could not vote for it. If, however, we are to adopt the proposition of three months' delay, there is no reason, in my opinion, why we can not add to that period of delay the further condition of a vote by the people. So, upon that ground, and that alone, I intend to vote for this resolution.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the taking of a vote upon the pending amendment, but it is an amendment which I believe means a great deal to the people of the country. I have always advocated the elimination of war. I have always believed that it would be possible for Congress to enact a law which would give the people of the country the right, at least in an advisory way, to say whether or not we should go to war. I know that such a statement is very displeasing to some of the ultraradicals and were it not for the fact that some of them are now pleading for peace merely for the purpose of adopting this treaty, I think I could hear their voices raised in denunciation of such a proposition. I am anxious to have a record vote on this proposition regardless of whether my associates on this side favor it or not.

The people of the country furnish the men to fight the war. The mothers of the country rear the children and their parents educate them; the people of the country pay for the wars; Congress does not pay for the wars; Congress only appropriates the money, which belongs to the people; yet it seems that some would make us believe that we ought to be rebuked and punished when we suggest the proposition that an advisory vote shall be taken whether or not we shall go to war. No man who is honestly and sincerely for lasting and permanent peace and who wishes to obviate war will oppose a proposition like that offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Mr. President, those of us who had our sons in the late conflict know what war means. I realize, of course, that for a person who is not opposed to war and who has no one, especially no boys of his own, to send to war, such a person does not find it so difficult to vote for war.

We are now beginning to realize what it has cost us to go through all these wars, first our Revolutionary War, and then what it cost us to perpetuate this Union, when we had an internecine strife. Is it not reasonable to believe that when it is only internecine strife we could at least obviate or eliminate war?

Nobody is complaining, Mr. President—at least, I am not complaining—because we have in the past engaged in war; but we are proposing now to prevent war and to promote lasting peace. I do not know by what mode of reasoning we can say that there shall be no more wars, while we are preparing for war to the utmost, building up armies and navies, expending the people's money by the billions, and taking it out of the power of the people to say, even in an advisory manner, whether we shall have war. I can not see how you are going to square such activities with your mode of reasoning nor how you are going to perpetuate peace.

Militarism breeds wars. If Germany had not been prepared, as she had been preparing for years, she would not have marched her armies into Belgium and France, and her Government would not have been destroyed. It was militarism that destroyed Germany, and the people of Germany had nothing whatever to say about the war. It was the military chiefs who built up that powerful military machine.

However, it seems, Mr. President, that it is always very dangerous, because it might set a bad precedent, to submit anything to the judgment of the American people. I may be entirely mistaken, but I honestly and sincerely believe that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma, if it is written into this treaty, will be one of the most effective means of obviating future wars. We refuse to reduce armaments; instead of reducing armaments, we are by the very provisions of the pending treaty holding up and increasing them.

Mr. President, I have no hesitancy in saying that if this amendment stood by itself alone I should be very glad to vote for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair for the day with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. In view of his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SHIELDS's name was called). I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is detained at home on account of sickness. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have been informed that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with whom I have a pair, has not voted. That being the case, I transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "nay."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I should like to ask if the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have a pair with that Senator which I transfer to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce the absence on official business of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] are detained from the Senate by illness. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are absent on public business.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 67, as follows:

YEAS—16.

So Mr. GORE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the following conditions and reservations to be incorporated in the resolution of ratification.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the Senator now taking up the reservations?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I have a couple of amendments. I have no desire to discuss them, because I am not able to-day to discuss them, or else I should; but unless we can have an understanding—and I do not suppose we can—I want to offer those amendments before the reservations are taken up.

Mr. LODGE. I suppose those amendments can be offered at any time.

Mr. BORAH. I should be glad if they could go over, because I am not in a condition to debate them. I should like a little time, but not much.

Mr. LODGE. The offering of the reservations, I take it, will not cut them off. I am not aware of anything that will prevent their being offered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question with reference to the parliamentary situation.

My understanding is, under the rules, that the reservations relate to a resolution adopting the treaty, and that resolution is supposed to reflect the voice of the Senate, the conclusions of the Senate. It seems to me that it is clearly out of order to adopt a resolution of ratification or rejection until the Senate has reached a conclusion with reference to what amendments it desires to adopt.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I am not offering the resolution of ratification.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that, but the Senator is proposing an amendment to a resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I am not. I am proposing conditions and reservations to be added to and incorporated in the resolution of ratification when that resolution is presented, which is always the last thing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I judged, from what the Senator was proposing to do, that he proposed to offer reservations at this time and have a vote on them.

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, if the Senator is only offering them for the information of the Senate, that is a different proposition.

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President; I propose to offer them now for action, and, if the Chair will permit me, reservations are not mentioned in the rules at all. The practice has been hitherto to offer reservations the last thing in the Senate, with the resolution of ratification. I am unable to see why they can not be offered in Committee of the Whole exactly as an amendment is offered, to be placed, exactly as an amendment has to be placed, upon the resolution of ratification when it is reached. That resolution can not be dealt with until the Senate has determined what amendments, if any, to make to the treaty, and what reservations, if any, it will adopt; and I have come to the conclusion, after studying the rules, that there is no reason why the reservations to be incorporated should not be offered at this stage, in order—as this treaty is of peculiar moment, unlike any other we have ever had—that the Senate may consider them in Committee of the Whole, and subsequently in the Senate, before final agreement to them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I think this question is a matter of importance to our procedure, because we have got to know where the line rests when we finally go to vote. I think that the offering of reservations in the Committee of the Whole and not in the Senate proper is undoubtedly in contravention of the letter of the rules of the Senate. As to whether the rules of the Senate can limit the constitutional power of this body to adopt reservations or amendments, I have my doubts, and I am not concerned about that part of it. So far as I am personally concerned I am not concerned as to whether it is against the letter of the rules of the Senate or not. I have no objection to the Senator offering his reservations in the Committee of the Whole instead of waiting to go into the Senate, but I do think it is important and necessary that we dispose of all of the amendments, and then take up the reservations to the resolution of ratification. If I may have the attention of the Chair for a moment, while I am not taking issue with the Senator on the question as to whether he can offer his reservations in the Committee of the Whole, I contend that it is not in order to offer these reservations in the Committee of the Whole or in the Senate until either the Committee of the Whole or the Senate has disposed of amendments.

Now, the rule distinctly says that the first business before the Senate shall be the disposition of amendments.

It is true, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, that the rule ignores reservations. It says nothing about offering reservations, but it does say that after the Senate has adopted or rejected such amendments as are proposed to the treaty, then a resolution of ratification shall be in order. A reservation is not standing out separate from a resolution of ratification or rejection. In the end it must be a part of it. Of course, if the Senator wanted to offer some interpretation independently of the resolution of ratification, and that was all he desired, he might make progress with great ease, because there are many of us who are very much opposed to an amendment of the treaty, either by a textual amendment or a reservation, who are not very much concerned what interpretation the Senator or anybody else desires to put on the treaty.

The point I make is that, although reservations are not mentioned in the rule, the rule prescribes that the first business shall be amendment and that the next business shall be the adoption of a resolution of ratification that reflects the action of the Senate in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. That is not the next step.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is a subsequent step.

Mr. LODGE. No; they have to go to the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course.

Mr. LODGE. "Of course" that is a very different proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think, myself, under the strict rule, we could not offer a reservation here; but I have no objection to that, Mr. President. I am not seeking to press that point, as far as I am personally concerned. The point that I am pressing is that amendments must be first disposed of, because a reservation such as has been offered here, and such as I suppose the Senator is offering——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I can protect my position by offering a reservation to cover the same things, referring to articles 10 and 11. I understand that is the point the Senator refers to?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; I have no objection to voting on the amendments, but I want it to be understood that the amendments are closed before we go to a vote on reservations.

Mr. BORAH. The amendments which I am proposing to offer have already been drawn as reservations, and it was a mere matter of what I thought was courtesy to the committee of which I was a member that I offer them as amendments rather than as reservations, because the report of reservations by the committee did not cover them. I am perfectly willing to withdraw them as amendments; and if the amendments do not cover the subject satisfactorily, I will offer them as reservations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is entirely satisfactory. The only point I was trying to make, Mr. President, was that we should not go into the question of adopting reservations and then go back to amendments. I wanted it understood that that door is closed when we took up reservations.

Mr. LODGE. Amendments can be offered in the Senate, of course.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is a question that is open to debate when we get to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I think I might as well read the rule:

> When a treaty is reported from a committee with or without amendment, it shall, unless the Senate unanimously otherwise direct, lie over one day for consideration; after which it may be read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, when it shall be proceeded with by articles, and the amendments reported by the committee shall be first acted upon, after which other amendments may be proposed; and when through with, the proceedings had as in Committee of the Whole shall be reported to the Senate, when the question shall be, if the treaty be amended, "Will the Senate concur in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole?" And the amendments may be taken separately, or in gross if no Senator shall object; after which new amendments may be proposed.

Mr. President, I have given this matter a great deal of reflection. I am not going to repeat what I have already said, but it seems to me that as that rule stands, it is entirely in order to offer reservations in Committee of the Whole, and I think there are many reasons that might be adduced in its support. But I do not wish to delay the discussion by debating the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has withdrawn his point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I only made the point of order against the offering of reservations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the point was that if the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] had amendments to offer, that they must be first disposed of before the reservations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no point of order pending now, the Chair understands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My position was that whether in the Senate or in Committee of the Whole, after we have taken up the resolution of ratification and the reservations, it is too late then to offer amendments either in the Senate or in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. If the point of order has been withdrawn, Mr. President, I will offer the reservations.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to understand what is the parliamentary situation. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts proposes at this time to offer reservations?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. SWANSON. Which would constitute amendments?

Mr. LODGE. I say nothing about constituting amendments. If the Senator had listened to what I move——

Mr. SWANSON. I listened very carefully.

Mr. LODGE. I moved the adoption of the following conditions and reservations to be incorporated in a resolution of ratification, which I do not, of course, offer now.

Mr. SWANSON. I understood that. Does the Senator insist that that would be in order now until the resolution of ratification is before the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. I think they are in order now. I think they are in order in the Senate. I do not think it is possible to deal with the resolution of ratification until the Senate has determined what is to go upon it, whether there are amendments to go upon it, or whether there are reservations to go upon it.

Mr. SWANSON. The only thing that seemed to me to be ambiguous was that these are offered as reservations which would be included in the resolution of ratification; that before the resolution of ratification is before the Senate you offer amendments to something you will afterwards propose to adopt. The parliamentary question I ask is, Suppose your resolution of ratification, with these reservations having been adopted in the committee, should be rejected, what would be the parliamentary status then?

Mr. LODGE. After the resolution of ratification has been defeated?

Mr. SWANSON. If the resolution should be defeated.

Mr. LODGE. The only motion then in order would be a motion to reconsider, and bring the treaty back into the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. If the question of reconsideration then can come up, it would reopen the entire question, as the Senator understands it?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I propose to offer each one of these reservations separately, so that there will be a vote upon each one. If that course is pursued in Committee of the Whole and in the Senate, of course, if a vote is taken on each reservation, each reservation would have to be reconsidered, just as if you bring a bill back, you must reconsider each amendment. But they will all be open to reconsideration in the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask the Senator this question: After you have offered reservations, and some have been adopted and others rejected, the resolution of ratification, if the resolution of ratification with the amended reservations, as you call them, should be rejected, what is the parliamentary situation then, as the Senator conceives it?

Mr. LODGE. My attention was diverted a moment. The Senator asks what would happen after a vote for reconsideration?

Mr. SWANSON. What does the Senator consider the parliamentary situation then? You offer reservations to be included in the resolution of ratification. They are agreed to, say, by the Senate in Committee of the Whole. Then you include them in your resolution of ratification. If that resolution of ratification should be rejected, including the reservations, what does the Senator consider that the parliamentary situation would then be before a reconsideration is had?

Mr. LODGE. Of course, a motion to reconsider must always apply to the vote which it is moved to reconsider. The motion would have to come, of course, from the prevailing side, which would be the minority of more than one-third.

Mr. SWANSON. Regardless of the side from which it comes?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator does not allow me to state the case.

Mr. SWANSON. I will allow the Senator to proceed.

Mr. LODGE. I have to go through these painful details in order to make it clear to my own rather slow-moving mind. You bring it back by a motion made by one of the prevailing side to reconsider, and you reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected, and that brings it back into the Senate with all the reservations attached to it.

Mr. SWANSON. Then what is the Senator's interpretation as to the right to substitute reservations which would then be offered or to consider the entire matter of reservations?

Mr. LODGE. The whole resolution and all the reservations, of course, are open——

Mr. SWANSON. Would be fully open to reconsideration in the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. They would have to be reconsidered.

Mr. SWANSON. I say, they would be entitled to a full reconsideration?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Would not the situation be, if the vote were reconsidered, to leave the resolution exactly in the same situation it was in immediately before the vote was taken?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. And subject to any parliamentary procedure that was then to be taken?

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr. SWANSON. The only point I want to have cleared up is, if reservations have been adopted in the Senate, and then you move to reconsider, what effect would their adoption in the Senate have on the reconsideration of the resolution of ratification?

Mr. LODGE. If you reconsider it, that would bring the resolution of ratification and the reservations back into the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. To do as it pleases with?

Mr. LODGE. Subject to any parliamentary procedure, as the Senator from Wisconsin has just suggested.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the Senator from Virginia a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, is anyone recognized as having the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. I do not know who has the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It may be immaterial, but——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I think the Senator from Massachusetts had the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I want, for the purpose of the record, to read a paragraph of the rule which provides how a resolution of ratification shall be formulated. The rule states that—

> The decisions thus made shall be reduced to the form of a resolution of ratification, with or without amendments, as the case may be, which shall be proposed on a subsequent day, unless, by unanimous consent, the Senate determine otherwise; at which stage no amendment shall be received, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I call for order in the Chamber. We can not hear what is going on.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to put this matter in a very definite and concrete form. I would like to have the Senator from Massachusetts state, in his opinion, after there has been a vote to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed, and that vote has carried and the matter has been reconsidered, whether the resolution is then subject to amendment by the Senate or whether the only thing we can do is to vote again as to whether it shall pass or not.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in the situation the Senator from North Dakota has described, it is certainly open to a motion to recommit, which would bring it back into the Senate in the same position and open to all amendments that it had at the beginning. A motion to recommit could not be cut off. As to the procedure of going back through each reservation then in Committee of the Whole, I am not clear, because the Senate has more than once, I find from the executive journals, reconsidered the vote and taken the resolution of ratification carrying the amendments right back into the Committee of the Whole. But it was done, I suppose, by unanimous consent. It could undoubtedly be done, because it has been done.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the event, Mr. President, that we come to reconsider the question in Committee of the Whole of reservations adopted, we would have to reconsider each reservation that you now present.

Mr. LODGE. That is the rule always. Of course, you can not reconsider 10 votes by one motion to reconsider. You have to reconsider each vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. As I understand the Senator, then, if it is recommitted to the Committee of the Whole we will have to go over every reservation that has been adopted in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. If it is recommitted, it has to start as with a new matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. Recommit it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Senator means, and not recommit it to the Senate. The point I wanted to get at is whether, when it is recommitted by the Senate, we can amend any one of the reservations that had been previously adopted by the Senate. I would like the view definitely, if the Senator from Massachusetts will give it, as to whether that can be done or whether it will have to go back to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE. It certainly can be done by a recommittal to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and therefore it can be reached in the same way. It is only another step. If a majority of the Senate desire to reconsider and go over all the reservations again, the regular procedure is open to them to do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. But suppose the Senate does not wish to refer it back to the Committee on Foreign Relations and refuses to do so, can we then amend the reservations which we have adopted before that time?

Mr. LODGE. If there are a majority having the power to make changes in the reservations, they could recommit to the committee and bring it out of the committee and make any changes they want.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me the difficulties which have been suggested would vanish if we took the right course. The proper course is to do as we do in the case of a bill, not to vote upon what amendments we will put into the bill, but to take the bill and consider amendments. The proper way to get reservations before the Senate is to offer a resolution of ratification containing the reservations in detail, and then take up and consider those amendments to that resolution. Then we get the subject before us in the only orderly and proper way. With the resolution of ratification and the different amendments or reservations in it, we can then take them up one by one as we would the paragraphs of a bill. That is the only legitimate way to do it.

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely what I propose to do, but the resolution of ratification can not be introduced until the last thing. The procedure is uniform. You can not present your final resolution of ratification until you know what is going on it, and you can not know what is going on it until the Senate has dealt both with the amendments which have to go on the resolution of ratification and the reservations which have to go on it.

The practice hitherto has been to present reservations up to the last stage, and then introduce the resolution of ratification. I took this step, which I thought the rules allowed, on account of the gravity of the situation, and also to meet a point which has been suggested to me and which I think is a point of great importance, and that is that many Senators have stated on the floor of the Senate that they were voting against amendments because they preferred to have them covered by reservations. Now, suppose that a reservation desired by a Senator to cover an amendment against which he voted, preferring the reservation method, when it is offered in the Senate is not satisfactory, or suppose the reservation is defeated, then he is deprived of his opportunity to vote on an amendment, and still he does not get the reservation which he desired and which guided his first vote on the amendment.

I introduced this in the Committee of the Whole because I thought, in a question of this gravity, there ought not to be any narrowness of parliamentary action, but there ought to be every possible opportunity for the Senate to deal with these reservations one by one in Committee of the Whole. Then, in the Senate there is an opportunity to deal with them again before they are attached to the resolution of ratification, which is nothing but an enacting clause. My purpose was to give the greatest latitude possible for dealing with the reservations.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I know the Senator's idea, and it seems to me he ought to make one point clearer. As he said, a great many Senators have voted against amendments on the theory that they would vote for reservations covering the same point. If the Senator's procedure is followed and he introduces his reservations in Committee of the Whole, if those Senators who are going to support those reservations, where they voted against amendments providing for similar things, find they are defeated in voting for the reservations, they will still have in the Senate an opportunity to vote for the amendments.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely. That is the point I made.

Mr. NORRIS. If you do not take that course, those Senators would be shut off from that right.

Mr. LODGE. I did not make it as clear as the Senator from Nebraska has done. That is the precise point. The whole purpose of my course here is not to restrict or cut off, but on the contrary to open the doors as wide as possible in our parliamentary procedure so that reservations can be dealt with in the most liberal way and in the manner in which, in my opinion, the gravity of the subject demands.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a minute?

Mr. LODGE. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand this to be the contention of the Senator from Massachusetts: These amendments—reservations, as he calls them—are adopted in Committee of the Whole. They come to the Senate and are adopted. They are then included in the resolution of ratification really as amendments. Then, say, that resolution of ratification, including these amendments, is defeated. I think if the resolution of ratification is defeated, others are in order. I believe that is clear.

Mr. LODGE. Others are not in order until a reconsideration has taken place.

Mr. SWANSON. Conceding that now, though I know that will be debated later——

Mr. LODGE. Yes; we will debate it later.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator insists the only way we can offer another resolution of ratification is to move to reconsider. That is his contention. What I want to get the Senator to make plain to the Senate is what is the effect of the resolution after a reconsideration, and in what status does that leave the treaty before the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. It brings back the treaty and the resolution of ratification.

Mr. SWANSON. It brings back the entire treaty?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. And the resolution of ratification?

Mr. LODGE. With the reservations and amendments, if there are any, attached to the resolution.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to ask this question: If the resolution is reconsidered, what do you consider; only the resolution of ratification that was rejected?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is too old a parliamentarian not to know that we can consider but one vote at a time. We may reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected, and that brings it back.

Mr. SWANSON. As it passed——

Mr. LODGE. Just as it left the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. As it passed the Senate. Do I understand the Senator contends that that leaves open to the Senate every question of ratification on all the separate reservations?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. And all the other amendments?

Mr. LODGE. Of course it does, because it is open to a motion to recommit.

Mr. SWANSON. Without that motion, what would the status be?

Mr. LODGE. That I am not prepared to say, because the Senate has pursued a different course in regard to that on different occasons.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. LENROOT addressed the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. My own judgment would be that in the Senate they could reconsider each vote on each reservation, if separate votes were taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair inquired if the Senator from Massachusetts would yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely rose to suggest that it would be much better if we get to voting and leave the results in the hands of Providence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. When the Senator replied to the Senator from Virginia that the reservations would be open to reconsideration he, of course, meant under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Of course.

Mr. LENROOT. And the situation would be that after that reconsideration it would be subject to any motion that would be in order before the vote was taken.

Mr. LODGE. That is absolutely my position. I have stated it two or three times.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator says "under the rule." That is, the phrase "under the rule" is open to debate. That is a very ambiguous statement as to how to consider it. I would like to ask the Senator if the resolution of ratification as it passed the Committee of the Whole and the Senate will be open to amendment after the vote of reconsideration has been passed?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think, under the rule, that it would be.

Mr. SWANSON. Then, if you vote to reconsider, the question would be whether the Senate would pass the resolution of ratification as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. Not at all. I have pointed out again and again that the road which is always followed when we wish to change a bill or a joint resolution is to recommit it, and then you have it all fresh from the beginning and can put on anything you want.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand the rule to recommit would take it back.

Mr. LODGE. That opens the whole treaty.

Mr. SWANSON. Suppose a motion to recommit were made, what then would be the situation? Could the resolution of ratification then be reconsidered and amended?

Mr. LODGE. After the motion to recommit is carried, of course, you can do anything with it.

Mr. SWANSON. Not recommit, but reconsider.

Mr. LODGE. After you have reconsidered, you have reconsidered that one vote. You have got to reconsider each of the others or else you have to resubmit it. That is what you have to do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In reply to the——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator let me ask him a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I believe the Senator yielded to me, and I am about to ask a question.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] asked whether a resolution of ratification, having been defeated and then reconsidered, is amendable. I want to call his attention to that section of the rule which was read a few moments ago which says:

> The decisions thus made shall be reduced to the form of a resolution of ratification—

Then follows matter immaterial to this question, and it then says:

> At which stage no amendments shall be received, unless by unanimous consent.

I take it, then, Mr. President, that the defeated resolution of ratification having been reconsidered, being in the same position that it was before it was defeated, it is not amendable except by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. However that may be, there is no question that you can proceed by recommittal to open the entire subject and put on any reservations you have the votes to put on.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts one question.

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The question brings us really to the issue which is being considered, but not mentioned. If reconsideration takes place when the treaty, with the provisos, has not received a two-thirds majority, does the Senator from Massachusetts think it would then be in order to offer as a substitute for the resolution of ratification with the provisos a straight resolution of ratification without any provisos at all?

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean after it comes back on reconsideration?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. You have brought back the treaty with the provisos into the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I confess that form of substitution had not occurred to me. I am not prepared to say.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think I have put my finger on the difficulty.

Mr. LODGE. I do not see how you can do it unless you reconsider the vote of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or unless it is referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. By recommittal.

Mr. UNDERWOOD and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho. He rose first.

Mr. BORAH. I was just going to say that we can not forestall the decision of the Chair nor of the Senate by discussing this proposition at this time.

Mr. LODGE. Of course we can not.

Mr. BORAH. I do not see anything particular to be gained by it. If we are going to take up and discuss wholly immaterial questions in the Senate that can not bind anybody for the future, I think I may as well go ahead with my amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LODGE. I should like my motion disposed of.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a material question.

Mr. LODGE. We have talked this matter up and talked it down, if I may say so to the Senator from Virginia, although the question is not now before the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. Before the motion comes to a vote, I desire to say that I understand the Senator is pursuing an unusual course, in that he offers amendments to the resolution of ratification, which is not as yet before the Senate. I understand the usual course has been to include reservations in the resolution of ratification. The Senator is really making them amendments to the treaty. Why does he do that?

Mr. LODGE. I am not doing it.

Mr. SWANSON. Perhaps the Senator has not done it, but that is the purpose.

Mr. LODGE. No; it is not the purpose.

Mr. SWANSON. Then why does the Senator want the reservations considered now?

Mr. LODGE. I can not attach the reservations to the resolution of ratification as in Committee of the Whole; that is impossible; there is no resolution of ratification here.

Mr. SWANSON. But the Senator pursues the unusual course of treating the reservations as amendments to be included in the resolution of ratification which is not here. Why?

Mr. LODGE. I do not propose them as amendments; I propose them specifically as reservations. There is no use in continuing this character of discussion.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator proposes them as amendments to the resolution of ratification which has not been offered. Why does he do that? If they are adopted and included in the resolution of ratification, and if that resolution should fail, and a motion to reconsider is made, according to what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] insists, if the motion to reconsider is adopted, the question simply comes up whether the treaty shall be ratified with the reservations or whether it shall be rejected. Senators admit the only way they can avoid that is to move to recommit to the committee.

Mr. LODGE. It does not make a particle of difference about that——

Mr. SWANSON. If it is recommitted to the committee it means a long delay. All I ask is that this matter may come before the Senate and that the will of the Senate may have an opportunity to express itself.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I am after. Now, let me say to the Senator from Virginia that if after the adoption of these reservations the resolution of ratification should fail, he may look for a very long delay indeed; it will be the delay of death.

Mr. SWANSON. I think that is the procedure the Senator is trying to follow.

Mr. LODGE. If these reservations are put on the treaty, it will be ratified; and it will not be ratified, in my judgment, in any other way.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. UNDERWOOD addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] a moment ago made a very pertinent suggestion that we were discussing a question that had not arisen; but it is a question that is going to arise, and after the declarations coming from the Senators in charge of the pending treaty as to what the rules mean and what they are, I am not willing to let those statements go into the RECORD without contradiction and allow those who are not familiar with the Senate rules to take that as the decision of the Senate. Of course, I realize that ultimately the presiding officer of the Senate will be called on to decide this question, and then the Senate will pass judgment on his decision; but in order that the RECORD may at least show my viewpoint in reference to the matter, and I think the viewpoint of some of my colleagues, I propose to state what it is.

In the first place, an amendment can be made to the treaty by a majority vote of the Senate, if the majority so desires. Up to the present time no amendment has been adopted. When amendments have all been disposed of either by acceptance or rejection, it is then the duty of the Senators in charge of the matter to propose a resolution of ratification voicing the sentiment of the Senate, as is suggested by the amendments according as they are adopted or rejected. That is all the rules provide for. A custom has grown up in the Senate that has gone so far as to become a part of the rules of the Senate that a resolution of ratification may not only reflect the vote of the Senate on amendments but it may reflect the viewpoint of the Senate by way of reservations. However, I never heard of a reservation being proposed in the Senate of the United States as a reservation—not as an interpretation—that was not included in the resolution of ratification. If it is a part of the resolution of ratification—and it must be to be effective—it can not be adopted separately from the resolution of ratification. Before a reservation is in order in the Senate—whether it be in Committee of the Whole or in the Senate proper I am not concerned about—the resolution of ratification must be here; it must be pending before the Senate. We can not any more act on an amendment to a proposition that is not before the Senate than we can act on the proposition itself that is not before the Senate.

If the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to offer the so-called reservations as amendments to the treaty, of course he is in order; but if he proposes to offer them as reservations that ultimately are included in the resolution of ratification, then the resolution of ratification must be pending; it must be the pending question before the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On what theory does the Senator from Alabama think that a reservation can not be adopted except the resolution of ratification is drawn in form and is before the Senate at the same time, when the rule specifically provides that amendments must be adopted before the resolution is proposed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have just said that if these are amendments to the treaty, of course as amendments they are in order; I concede that; but if they are reservations they are reservations to what?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts. I have the floor, I believe.

Mr. LODGE. I think not. I yielded to the Senator from Alabama.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Alabama has the floor, I will wait until he shall have concluded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the Danish treaty, one of the last treaties ratified. To that treaty reservations were adopted, and then Senator Stone offered a resolution of ratification.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But that was by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no. The unanimous consent was in regard to taking action on the treaty on that day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then there was no objection, I may say, which was equivalent to unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. But Senator Stone held back the resolution of ratification.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was in the Senate when that resolution was adopted. There was no contest about it.

Mr. LODGE. Has the Senator from Alabama read the executive journal made up at that time? If not, I have it here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; but I know there was no contest in the Senate and no Senator then raised the question. But, Mr. President, I do not care what precedent may be cited growing out of that instance, because that treaty went through as a mere matter of form. There were no issues raised, as I happen to know, no matter what the executive journal may recite, as I was present in the Senate when it was ratified. The real issue is as to whether reservations are a part of the resolution of ratification. If they are they are either a part of it now as pending before this body or are proposed to be amendments to it. The contention I make is not whether they can be considered in Committee of the Whole or in the Senate, but it is that they can not be considered at all if they are proposed as reservations to the final resolution of ratification until the resolution of ratification is pending.

The Senator says the last thing to be done is to offer the resolution of ratification; that resolution is the last question we shall act on after amendments have been disposed of; but the Senator can not contend that after he offers the resolution of ratification other Senators can not propose amendments to it so long as we have a right to vote on it. Therefore, amendments may be added to it even after the Senator has perfected it to suit himself. Other Senators will have the privilege at least of proposing amendments, even if they can not obtain the votes to accomplish the result they desire.

So I contend that if we have closed the hour of offering amendments, if no Senator desires to offer further amendments, then the business before the Senate is the resolution of ratification and such amendments to it by way of reservation or otherwise as may be offered. That is the only way the Senate can in an orderly manner transact its business, and, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] suggested a moment ago, it is the correct way for us to transact our business.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator, does he mean to say that a resolution of ratification can be offered while the treaty is being considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think that the resolution of ratification could be offered; I merely said that I had no objection to the Senator offering reservations as amendments to the treaty.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama permit me a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. If the resolution of ratification can not be offered in Committee of the Whole, how can amendments to the resolution of ratification be offered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. LODGE. They are always in order before the resolution of ratification is presented.

Mr. SWANSON. No. The Senator says the resolution of ratification can not be offered in Committee of the Whole, and yet he says amendments to the resolution of ratification can be offered in Committee of the Whole. That is the contention.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. SWANSON. That is the position the Senator occupies.

Mr. LODGE. I never stated anything of the kind; there is no use of the Senator misstating my position.

Mr. SWANSON. Well, let me state it again.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; do not let us take any more time in this discussion.

Mr. SWANSON. The reservations are amendments to the resolution of ratification, and the Senator says that the original resolution can not be offered in Committee of the Whole, but amendments to that resolution can be offered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is because the rule orders it so.

Mr. SWANSON. The rule does not order it so. Let us see what the situation is, for we may just as well face it. Senators are confronted with a rule which says that the resolution of ratification shall contain the amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole or in the Senate. In order to avoid that rule the Senator, in Committee of the Whole, brings in reservations as amendments to the resolution of ratification. What is the effect of that?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Alabama has yielded to me. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Virginia that the Senator from Massachusetts has not offered any amendments to the resolution of ratification. That is where I think the Senator from Virginia misunderstands the situation.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not misunderstand the matter at all. The Senator offered the reservations to be adopted now and to be accepted as amendments to the original resolution of ratification——

Mr. LODGE. Not as amendments, but as reservations.

Mr. SWANSON. To be included in the resolution of ratification.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia can misstate my position faster than I can state it. I have stated it over and over again, but the Senator keeps misstating it, and it is a mere waste of the time of the Senate to continue the discussion.

Mr. SWANSON. Let us see what the purpose is. All this contention would not be without a material purpose. The Senator from Massachusetts endeavors, by a majority vote, to make the Senate either reject or accept what he brings here or force a motion to reconsider. The Senator from Connecticut has said that if the motion to reconsider is agreed to, the question recurs, Shall the resolution of ratification as amended be accepted or rejected? It seems to me if we want to get an expression of the will of the Senate as to what, in their judgment, should be put in the resolution of ratification, the proper course would be to secure a unanimous-consent agreement, in view of the rule, that if one resolution of ratification is rejected another one shall be in order, or, in case of a motion to reconsider, that the resolution shall be subject to amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will pardon me, while I dislike to interrupt him, I should prefer to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. SWANSON. Very well.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to make clear my position. If the Senator from Massachusetts promises reservations here that are ultimately to become a part of the resolution of ratification, I desire to make a point of order that they are not in order until the resolution of ratification is before the Senate. I am not concerned whether he offers the reservations in Committee of the Whole or in the Senate, but until the original resolution of ratification of which it is proposed they shall become a part is before this body the reservations are not in order.

Aside from that, there has been much argument here as to what would happen if the resolution of ratification of the Senator from Massachusetts should be voted down.

I recognize that what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said awhile ago is true, that we are discussing a problem before it arises; but, as I expect to vote against the resolution of ratification as offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, and hope that it may be defeated, I want the RECORD to show what my interpretation of the parliamentary situation will be when that happens.

I understood from the Senator's statement awhile ago that he takes the position that if this resolution of ratification ultimately is defeated the treaty is dead, or action on the treaty is inoperative, unless a motion to reconsider is made in the Senate or in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. President, I do not think there is any parliamentary law, nor is there any common sense, to sustain that proposition. The proposition before the Senate is the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany. In my understanding, there are but three ways of disposing of that in the Senate: One is for the Senate by a majority vote to refer it and thus temporarily dispose of it. Another, under the rules, is to indefinitely postpone it, which, under the rules of the Senate, requires a two-thirds vote; and a vote of that kind would kill the treaty, and that would be the end of it. The other disposition is for the President to withdraw the treaty from the Senate. Without the happening of one of those events, unquestionably the treaty is before the Senate continuously for action.

I think the position that the Senator from Massachusetts has taken with reference to the defeat of a resolution of ratification is absolutely unsound. What difference is there between defeating a resolution of ratification by a majority vote and defeating it by the vote of one more than a third of the Senate? Suppose it were entirely a question of a majority vote, Mr. President, to make the matter clear. Suppose it did not require a two-thirds vote to ratify this treaty. Suppose it merely required a majority vote, and the Senator from Massachusetts had jockeyed his resolution of ratification through the various hurdles of amendments and reservations to the point where it was ready to take the final jump, and when that time came, and he demanded a roll call on his resolution of ratification, it did not command a majority vote of the Senate: Would anybody say, because the Senator's resolution of ratification was defeated, that that defeated the treaty of peace with Germany? Why, I say there is no parliamentary precedent in the history of the ages that would sustain a position of that kind. More than that, it can not be weighed in the balance of the scales of common sense and be sustained.

The purpose of this great treaty is to enable these nations to establish the peace conditions of the world; and to say that because a resolution proposed by one faction of the Senate of the United States could not command a majority vote of this body, therefore the treaty must fail, is not common sense.

If that is true as to a majority vote, why is it not equally true as to a two-thirds vote? There is no difference between its status on a majority vote and its status on a two-thirds vote except the difference which the Constitution of the United States itself prescribes, and that is that a resolution of ratification must command a two-thirds vote. In all other particulars, or most other particulars, it must command a majority vote. Therefore it fails when it does not get a majority vote; but here it must command a two-thirds vote, and one more vote than a third of the Senate will reject it. Now, what does that do? It rejects it just in the way that you would reject any other resolution by a majority vote of the Senate. The resolution having been rejected, it goes to the waste-paper basket; and the Senate, through its membership, is entitled to propose some other procedure to dispose of the treaty of peace. That is all there is to the proposition.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely.

Mr. LODGE. The Constitution says nothing about a majority vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, undoubtedly; but it does about a two-thirds vote.

Mr. LODGE. One moment. That is found in the rule, and at one time the Senate had a rule under which a two-thirds vote was required for every amendment. It is a mere matter of the rules of the Senate. The majority part of it has nothing to do with the Constitution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure. The Constitution prescribes a majority vote for the passage of bills and other resolutions—that is what I was referring to, and not to the treaty—and I was simply saying that because the Constitution, in reference to bills and other resolutions, requires a majority vote in one place, and here it requires a two-thirds vote, it does not change the parliamentary status of the situation. Unquestionably it can not be anything but the rejection of the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, I have not occupied the time of the Senate in giving my views in reference to this treaty. I have been so concerned that the peace of the world might be consummated, and that the conclusion of this war might be reached at an early date, that I preferred through these months to sit in silence rather than further to delay action on the consummation of this treaty; but the time has come when the people who believe that the most important question before this Nation is the consummation of peace must determine on what action they are going to take.

I do not suppose there is a man in the Senate of the United States who, if he had had the power to write this treaty in the beginning, would have written it in the exact form in which we find it before the Senate. More than that, I do not suppose for one minute that if the President of the United States had had full power to write this treaty he would have written a treaty such as is now pending before us in all its provisions. Unquestionably this is a document of compromises—the compromises of 26 nations sitting at the peace table trying to work out their differences and solve their difficulties in an instrument that might bring about the peace of the world. The primary question before the Senate is as to whether or not we shall accept this treaty, though we may differ from it in part, and consummate the peace of our country or whether we shall reject it and send it back into the turmoils of European politics.

Of course I am not now going into the question of discussing how far we might make reservations or interpretations that will endanger the peace of the world, or how far we might go and further endanger the peace of the world and the rejection of this treaty.

I do not think that is necessary from my standpoint. I am not going to take any chances about it at all. If this treaty does not work out all right in two years we can repudiate it, and I think that is sufficient to protect my country from any dangers that might arise out of it; but I think the straight road to the conclusion of peace is the ratification of this treaty without amendment and without reservation.

Therefore I am not willing to vote for any amendment or reservation, or any resolution of ratification with reservations in it, until the opportunity has been afforded to the people of the United States to take a direct vote on a resolution of ratification without amendments or reservations—an unconditional vote of ratification. If that happens, and it can not command the necessary two-thirds, then I realize that some compromise must be made; but I say to those men who differ with me—and I am not criticizing them; I am always glad to recognize the right of the other man to maintain his own position, as I ask that I may have the right to maintain mine—there are just two votes on this treaty of peace. One is absolutely in the hands of the President of the United States and the other is in the hands of the Senate of the United States. It is idle to say that a treaty of peace can be consummated until those two votes vote together, until those two minds concur in a final agreement.

The President of the United States has made this treaty. He has sent assurance to foreign powers that it will be ratified by the Senate. He has announced to the people of the United States that he was opposed to any amendment or any reservation that amounted to an amendment; and why? Because he said that if it was proposed it endangered the final ratification of the treaty of peace; and that danger has grown since he uttered it, because when he first announced the proposition the treaty had not become a fact. It had not been ratified by the European powers. To-day this treaty is a living entity. Of the five great powers that are required to ratify it first, four have accepted it. It is the law of the world. It is a question as to whether we are going to be a part of it or stand out of it and make a separate treaty of peace with Germany.

With vital amendments to this treaty, affecting the internal affairs of England, France, Italy, or Japan, how could we expect them to accept amendments that modified or changed the treaty in reference to their own affairs? Yet such amendments have been proposed on the floor of the Senate.

If they had been adopted, Mr. President, I think the Government of the United States would have found itself, so far as this treaty is concerned, like Mahomet's coffin, between air and earth, suspended, with no resting place, no parliamentary status, no position in the world as to whether we were at peace or at war with Germany, an indefinite suspension, that might have wrought wreck and ruin to our internal affairs and disaster to our people.

I think that we who desire to have the immediate ratification of this treaty of peace, to sustain the hands of the President of the United States in his efforts to write this treaty and bring about the peace of the world, have but one course open to us, and if that is true, and we are men, we are going to take that course, regardless of what criticism may fall on our heads. More than that, I doubt whether there will be much criticism, because I think the common sense of the American people is with us. That course is that we should demand before this treaty is ratified in any other way that we have a right to vote on unconditional ratification. If that is rejected, then, of course, the President must recognize that the coordinate body in treaty making will not agree with him, and compromises must be made. But he is entitled to an honest vote, a clean record, as to whether the Senate accepts or rejects his position. I take it—and I believe it is true—that there are 40 men on the floor of the Senate who have the courage of their convictions.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator concede to the remaining Senators the same courage?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly. I just said so. There are 40 men on the floor of the Senate who have the courage of their convictions, in my judgment, to sustain the position that I have just announced. I, of course, recognize that those who differ with us have equal courage and an equal right.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. KING. Why does the Senator say, as I understood him, that the adoption of any of those reservations would necessitate the resubmission of the treaty to Germany and compel a renegotiation of the treaty with Germany? Does not the Senator think that there may be reservations and, indeed, amendments to the league, which would not occasion the resubmission of the treaty to Germany?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think so. Not any that I have seen around here. But I do not think that is very material, because most of those that have been offered undoubtedly would have required a resubmission.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question, but I will have to preface my question with a statement. The difficulty with the position of the Senator seems to be that the resolution of ratification has to come in the Senate after the amendments have been perfected; and, in the Committee of the Whole, unless it was by unanimous consent, a resolution of ratification could not be considered. Could not this entire difficulty be obviated by unanimous consent? Could we not obtain unanimous consent to offer a resolution of ratification in Committee of the Whole, to which any reservations that Senators might desire could be also offered, and for which also could be offered as a substitute a straight resolution of ratification, without any reservations? If such a unanimous-consent agreement could be made, would it not speed our deliberations?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think not, because under the rules of the Senate and the provision of the Constitution, a final resolution of ratification must receive a two-thirds vote, and there is no way to test the sentiment that I have spoken of by offering a substitute for somebody else's reservation. There is but one way in which it can be done, and that is to propose it as a resolution of ratification itself, and see whether or not it can command a two-thirds vote. I think that is the only way out of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If we were, by unanimous consent, considering a resolution of ratification in Committee of the Whole, could it not be proposed in Committee of the Whole, and could not the status of the Senate with reference to such a resolution there be tested?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I said a while ago, I have no objection to considering the resolution of ratification, if you want to do it by unanimous consent, either in Committee of the Whole or in the Senate. That is immaterial. But whether it is in Committee of the Whole or in the Senate, I want the rules of orderly procedure conformed to and carried out, in order that we may know at all times our status and our rights in these matters.

I think, Mr. President, that we might as well recognize that we are up against this proposition, in my judgment, that the Senator from Massachusetts and those who agree with him will ultimately propose a resolution of ratification that meets their conclusions, which in all human probability will not command a two-thirds vote in the Senate. When that is defeated, undoubtedly a resolution of ratification without reservations, unless some other resolution of ratification preceded it, will be offered. As to whether that can command a two-thirds vote I do not know and I do not predict. If it does, the treaty is ratified. If it does not, then the treaty will still be before the Senate, and we will have reached a status where those who believe in unconditional ratification will know that we can not have our way, and those who are proposing drastic amendments or reservations will know that they can not have their way, and then the question as to whether the Senate and the President can reach a compromise by which the treaty can be agreed to, that will be acknowledged by the European powers, or whether it will be necessary to finally reject it and open further negotiations with Germany, can be considered and voted on. But it is simply idle to waste days and hours, weeks and months, in the continuation of this debate about matters that we know must come to this final conclusion, this final test of a vote on these two questions.

I therefore think that the wise thing for the Senate to do is not to disturb the parliamentary situation, which is a question for the Chair to decide, but is to limit this debate and bring the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts to a vote. If he wins, he has accomplished his object. If he loses, then the other issue comes before the Senate for its decision. We will make progress, and we will meet the wishes of the country.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator wants to make progress, why does he not ask unanimous consent to take a vote on an unconditional ratification of the treaty now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. LODGE. All right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That can not be done in Committee of the Whole. It must be considered in the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes; by unanimous consent we can do anything. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. There will be order in the galleries. This violation of the rules will not be allowed to continue. The occupants of the galleries have been notified to keep quiet, and I call on the doorkeepers to remove the men who do not obey the rules of the Senate. The doorkeepers know who they are.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I am not assuming to lead on this side, because this side has been ably and well represented by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and I make no proposal coming from this side that does not meet with his approval. I recognize that a resolution of unconditional ratification coming at this time does not come with the force that it would have after the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts is defeated.

Mr. LODGE. Then I understand the Senator objects?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not. I am not going to object. If the Senator will bear his soul in patience, I will give Senators on the other side a chance to object. I realize that such a request will not be as forceful as it would be if coming after the Senator's resolution is defeated. But I also realize that this is no child's play; that this is no hour in which we can stand on technicalities. The great duty we owe to this country is to act on this treaty one way or the other, solve the issue, and bring the question before us to a vote.

Therefore, Mr. President, accepting the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, I ask unanimous consent that the leader on this side of the Chamber, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], may have unanimous consent to propose at this time a resolution of unconditional ratification for the consideration of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have been waiting to propose a unanimous-consent agreement myself, and I shall carry out the purpose I have had.

The offer which is made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is recognized to be extraordinary. All the precedents of the Senate indicate that reservations are not considered in Committee of the Whole, but are considered in the Senate. So far as I know, there has been, perhaps, no exception, and certainly there have been few, in which the Committee of the Whole has done anything more than read the treaty and consider proposed amendments to it. The rules require that when that proceeding has been finished by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the Committee of the Whole reports the treaty to the Senate, and all that the Senate does when it is so reported is to consider a resolution of ratification.

There are many precedents for saying that the Senate is at perfect liberty, while considering a resolution of ratification, to consider reservations, interpretations, and qualifications, and it seems to me that that is the orderly proceeding to take in this case. But if the Senator from Massachusets fears that some advantage may be taken or some advantage lost by considering it in that way, I suggest a unanimous-consent agreement in advance, so that he may know, and all Senators may know, that the Senate will be just as free, sitting as the Senate, to consider a resolution of ratification with reservations, with qualifications, and with interpretations, as it might be to consider reservations or qualifications or interpretations in Committee of the Whole.

The unanimous-consent agreement which I suggest is this, that it shall be in order, when the Committee of the Whole reports the treaty to the Senate, to offer resolution of ratification with or without reservations, interpretations, or qualifications, and any Senator may demand a separate vote on any reservation, interpretation, or qualification. Any pending resolution and any pending reservation, interpretation, or qualification, shall be open to amendment or substitute.

Mr. LODGE. There is no need of unanimous consent. That is the rule now. All that can be done without unanimous consent. Of course, you can offer a substitute for anything before the final vote is taken.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, if that is perfectly understood, there certainly can be no reason why the Senate should not at this time pursue the ordinary course as in Committee of the Whole and report the treaty to the Senate. Therefore, I move that the Committee of the Whole now report the treaty to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. That is a wholly different proposition. Is the Senator ready to vote now on the treaty without any amendment or reservation? That is the only question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am ready to vote on it as soon as we get into the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. No; is the Senator ready to vote now on it without any reservations or conditions attached?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Just as soon as it is reported to the Senate in an orderly way.

Mr. LODGE. No unanimous consent will take it out of the Committee of the Whole. The Senator need not worry about it. The unanimous consent is a plain proposition to vote on it unconditionally. Is that the Senator's request? If it is, I will not object to it, but I am not going to agree to a lot of stuff about the rules.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have made this suggestion for unanimous consent in perfect good faith. There is no advantage to be taken on either side in conducting this matter in the ordinary way. The Senator from Massachusetts is endeavoring to do it in an extraordinary and unusual way, contrary to the precedents of the Senate, and when I suggested to him a few moments ago that it should be taken up in the Senate by unanimous consent, the Senator from Massachusetts intimated he feared some advantage would be taken of the situation.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, is not the proposition submitted by the Senator from Nebraska exactly the same proposition as that submitted by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that it is. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will allow the Senate to pass on the question of the unexpected offer coming from the Senator from Massachusetts. Of course, it is unusual to pass on a resolution of ratification in Committee of the Whole, but it undoubtedly can be done by unanimous consent.

There are many of us who for months have sat here to sustain the President and demand an honest vote on the question of whether he should be sustained. We thought we might have to battle to get that position. There may be some technical advantage in postponing that vote, but I think the country is entitled to vote as to whether we will ratify unconditionally. Senators are entitled to take a position before the country for unconditional ratification or not, and when that vote is taken it will clear the atmosphere, I think, to a large extent. I sincerely hope the Senator from Nebraska will allow us to take that vote on his own resolution of ratification.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should prefer to have my unanimous-consent agreement assented to by the Senator from Massachusetts, but failing that, I move that the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace now pending before the Senate, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator should ask unanimous consent. Of course, it is out of order without unanimous consent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. I make no objection to unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Reserving the right to object, it is understood that if the treaty fails of ratification by that vote, it leaves it exactly where it was before the vote was taken?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope we will all agree to that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do I get unanimous consent?

Mr. McCORMICK. Reserving the right to object, what was the inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and what was the reply thereto, and is its effect binding and conclusive?

Mr. LENROOT. To make it clear, I will ask the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] if he will not incorporate in his unanimous-consent agreement that in case of failure to ratify the treaty shall be at the same stage as if the vote had not been taken.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is all right.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I see no objection to that. That is my theory of this matter. I think if the resolution of ratification fails to receive a two-thirds vote it leaves the treaty right where it has been.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] asks unanimous consent that the Senate may proceed at once to vote upon the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany signed at Versailles, France, June 28, 1919.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There should be included the words "Provided, That if the treaty shall fail of ratification it shall occupy the same position in the proceedings of the Senate that it occupied before the vote was taken."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I assent to that. Has unanimous consent been given?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. FALL. It has not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, of course, I have my views upon this entire subject, and some of them have been expressed, as vigorously as I knew how, prior to this time. I do not believe that this subject can be treated in the way that is now proposed. I believe that if the vote is taken as proposed, and two-thirds do not vote for the ratification resolution, the treaty is dead forever, and I can not consent, by my silence, to any other construction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is an objection, then?

Mr. FALL. I think that we all are considerably at sea in the matter of the treatment of the treaty and the rules applying, and if I may trespass upon the time of the Senate for a few moments, I will express my views upon the subject.

In the matter of the treaty, while it is treated by this body in a legislative way, the Senate itself is taking part in the passage of executive duties in advising and consenting to the ratification of the treaty. It is not a legislative act in that sense. The rules are perfectly clear as to the procedure which should be followed. The general rules or the general parliamentary rules do not apply in the treatment of this subject.

The rule is to me perfectly plain. The rule provides that we shall consider the treaty in the Committee of the Whole, and amendments; that we shall then go into the Senate, and that the only motion there is, Shall the action of the Committee of the Whole be concurred in or not?

That is the rule when we get into the Senate. If concurred in, the resolution of ratification is then formed, and you are not amending a resolution of ratification. You are now preparing a resolution of ratification by amendments, if you adopt them, whether you call them reservations or not. In the parliamentary treatment of these reservations, irrespective of their diplomatic effect, if the Senators can see anything in them, irrespective of how they may be treated diplomatically, in parliamentary treatment or legislative treatment in this body, they are considered exactly as amendments; and upon the action of the Committee of the Whole in adopting the amendments, whether you call them reservations or whether you call them amendments, depends the form of the resolution of ratification.

No action has been taken upon the pending amendments whatsoever, or at least unanimous consent is asked in Committee of the Whole, which is entirely out of order, unknown to the rules at all, unless it were submitted in the form of the formation of a resolution of ratification. If the Senator were to offer it as a form of resolution of ratification to be reported and adopted by the Senate, he might have some ground there for a motion or for a unanimous consent for such request, but to have a vote upon what he chooses to introduce here now in Committee of the Whole as a resolution of ratification or a reservation and if that fails of passage then we are back in the same position we are now occupying is, to my mind, extremely ridiculous. We are playing with the entire subject.

If Senators desire to go on record for the unreserved ratification of the treaty, if they desire to express themselves, let them rise here and so express themselves. It will go into the RECORD. There is no necessity for violating all the rules of the Senate in an endeavor to do the thing in this indirect way. I have no objection whatsoever to a vote being taken, but I want it understood distinctly that I do object to any unanimous consent which would put the matter back in the same position as it was before the vote is taken. If you support it, and if you vote upon your resolution of ratification simply to test the matter, I think you would be exactly where you are by your reservations now. It is child's play; it is unknown to the rules.

The Senate is in Committee of the Whole. If you are in good faith, if Senators on the other side of the Chamber are in good faith, then move that the committee now rise, go into the Senate, and report the resolution of ratification without any reservations, and that you will then go back into the Committee of the Whole for treatment of this matter exactly as you have it.

I have no objection to your taking a test vote for the benefit of posterity. That is all it is. I have no possible objection to that, but I do object to undertaking to tie the Senate in any manner whatsoever to any such doctrine as has been announced in this request.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do I understand the request is objected to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. FALL. As formed, it is objected to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In what form would the Senator consent to its going through?

Mr. FALL. What is the Senator's purpose, to stay in Committee of the Whole or to go into the Senate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So far as I am concerned, my only purpose is to have an unqualified vote on the ratification of the treaty, without amendment or reservation.

Mr. FALL. And that vote can only be taken in the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It can be taken anywhere by unanimous consent.

Mr. FALL. No; it can not be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It can be taken anywhere by unanimous consent, but I am willing——

Mr. FALL. It can be taken, of course, but it would have no effect if taken in Committee of the Whole, but it will have effect if we go into the Senate. If the Senator will move to go into the Senate, I shall make no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask to amend the request for unanimous consent so as to read "in the Senate." We can go into the Senate by unanimous consent. Of course, we will agree to come out if the motion is not agreed to in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. FALL. In not insisting upon my objection to the request for unanimous consent I am for the first time since I have been a Member of this body knowingly and willfully stultifying myself as a Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I ask that the unanimous-consent request as modified be now stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state it.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that the Senate shall immediately pass to the parliamentary stage of the Senate and will vote therein upon the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, signed at Versailles, France, June 28, 1919——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there should be inserted in the resolution the words "two-thirds of the Senators present and voting concurring therein."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly that should be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will decide that it is not a thing the Chair can do.

Mr. LODGE. I am only giving the universal form of ratification resolutions; that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will insert the words suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is further agreed that if the treaty shall fail of ratification, it shall occupy the same position in the proceedings of the Senate that it occupied before the vote was taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Before the words "of the Senate," as stated by the Secretary, there should be inserted the words "as in Committee of the Whole." When the treaty goes back, it goes back to the Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GORE. I should like to hear the proposed agreement again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The agreement will be again stated.

The proposed agreement as finally perfected was read by the Secretary, as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that the Senate shall immediately pass to the parliamentary stage of the Senate and will vote therein upon the following resolution:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present and voting concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany signed at Versailles, France, June 28, 1919; and, further, that if the treaty shall fail of ratification it shall immediately be returned to the parliamentary stage of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I object.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the treaty be reported to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have made a motion which, I think, has to be disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] raise the point of order that the resolutions were not in order in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I raised the point of order that if they were offered as reservations they were not in order. I do not know whether they are offered as amendments or reservations.

Mr. LODGE. They are offered as reservations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, I make the point of order that they are not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The presiding officer at best only makes a ruling that enables an appeal to be taken and states a question that the Senate will ultimately decide. Hitherto the Senate on many important questions has construed the rules to meet the exigencies of the occasion as the Chair looked at the rules.

The rules of the Senate provide that this treaty shall be first considered in Committee of the Whole; be amended, if desired by a majority of the Senators; be then reported to the Senate, the question there being, Shall the Senate concur in the amendments made in the Committee of the Whole? Then it is amendable in the Senate. When all the proceedings are through the decisions are to be reduced to the form of a resolution of ratification, with or without amendments, as the case may be.

If treaties and the constitutional right of the Senate to advise and consent to the making of them are to be governed by a strict construction of the rules and if it were a matter of first impression, the Chair would be compelled to hold that if there were no amendments made in the Committee of the Whole or in the Senate there could be no form of resolution of ratification other than one providing for a straight ratification of the treaty; but that is in direct violation of the uniform practice of the Senate of the United States.

Reservations, interpretations, and exceptions have gone into many treaties. Some of them have been published in a Senate document, and it is not needful to refer to them.

The Chair may be pardoned for saying one thing which perhaps is not pertinent to the determination of this question. This is the most important treaty that ever was presented to the Senate of the United States. It involves far-reaching consequences to the people of this country and to the people of the world. It took six months to make it; it has taken four months of exhaustive discussion in the Senate up to the present hour to consider it. Recognizing the right of the Senate and realizing that it will exercise that right whether it is agreeable to the Chair or not, the present occupant of the chair is unwilling to make any sort of a technical ruling that will prevent the Senate of the United States from ratifying this treaty either without reservations or with any character of reservations that a majority chooses to put into the resolution of ratification. The Chair is unwilling to construe the rules in so strict and narrow a way that the treaty may be pigeon-holed or hung up by such narrow construction.

The Chair is going to hold that a majority of the Senate can present whatever it pleases to the Senate in the way of reservations or interpretations, and the Chair thinks that these reservations, as they are called, ought to be considered as in Committee of the Whole in justice to certain Senators of the United States who have been voting against amendments to the treaty, with statements made that they voted against the amendments because they thought they could preserve their views by way of reservation and interpretation. The Chair is unwilling to rule that they shall be put in the position of waiting until the resolution of ratification is presented and then finding themselves confronted with the necessity of voting for a resolution of ratification which contains reservations that do not meet with their views upon the question.

The whole conduct of this treaty since it came into the Senate by the Senate itself impels the Chair to rule that reservations are in order in the Committee of the Whole, to the end that Senators who have voted against amendments may have the opportunity of again presenting the amendments and voting upon them in the Senate if the reservations adopted in the Committee of the Whole are not satisfactory to such Senators. The Chair accordingly overrules the point of order.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I objected to the request for unanimous consent a while ago very largely for the reasons the Chair has just stated as the basis of his ruling, of which I heartily approve.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I now, after some interruption, renew the motion which I made two hours ago. I move the adoption of the following conditions and reservations to be incorporated in the resolution of ratification. I have made a modification in the condition which is numbered 1, in regard to making the reservations and understandings a part of the conditional resolution of ratification, by inserting at the proper place the words "by an exchange of notes." I have also made, as Senators will see if they compare it with the print, one or two further changes that are of no importance. I shall ask for a vote on each paragraph separately after they have been read. I think they had all better be read first, so as to go into the RECORD, and then I shall ask to take up the first one for consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will not the Senator ask that they be also printed in the form of a bill?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I ask that they be printed in bill form, as read by the Secretary, for the use of the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I understand that there is also submitted with these reservations a preamble, which is submitted for adoption as well as the several numbered reservations.

Mr. LODGE. I mentioned that, but I referred to it as conditions. It is generally called, and miscalled, a preamble. Of course a preamble always precedes, and never follows, the enacting clause. It is really a declaration of conditions of ratification, that has been called commonly the preamble.

Mr. McCUMBER. The point I wanted to ascertain was whether or not the Senator, in asking for a vote upon each of these separately numbered reservations, would also ask for a vote upon what is commonly designated a preamble.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I certainly shall, and it is numbered I in what I have sent to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The following conditions and reservations are proposed, to be incorporated in the resolution of ratification:

"1. The reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate are to be made a part and a condition of the resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of said resolution of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

"2. The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of notice of withdrawal from the league of nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

"3. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

"4. No mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, Part I, or any other provision of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

"5. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children, and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the league of nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

"6. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the assembly or by the council of the league of nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which, in the judgment of the United States, depend upon or relate to its long-established policy commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said league of nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

"7. The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158 and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan.

"8. The Congress of the United States will provide by law for the appointment of the representatives of the United States in the assembly and the council of the league of nations and may, in its discretion, provide for the participation of the United States in any commission, committee, tribunal, court, council, or conference, or in the selection of any members thereof, and for the appointment of members of said commissions, committees, tribunals, courts, councils or conferences, or any other representatives under the treaty of peace, or in carrying out its provisions, and until such participation and appointment have been so provided for and the powers and duties of such representatives have been defined by law, no person shall represent the United States under either said league of nations or the treaty of peace with Germany or be authorized to perform any act for or on behalf of the United States thereunder, and no citizen of the United States shall be selected or appointed as a member of said commissions, committees, tribunals, courts, councils, or conferences, except with the approval of the Senate of the United States.

"9. The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

"10. The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the league of nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency, organized under the league of nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States.

"11. If the United States shall at any time adopt any plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the league of nations under the provisions of article 8, it reserves the right to increase such armaments without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

"12. The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in article 16 of the covenant of the league of nations, residing within the United States or in countries other than that violating said article 16, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

"13. Nothing in articles 296, 297, or in any of the annexes thereto or in any other article, section, or annex of the treaty of peace with Germany shall, as against citizens of the United States, be taken to mean any confirmation, ratification, or approval of any act otherwise illegal or in contravention of the rights of citizens of the United States.

"14. The United States declines to accept as trustee or in her own right any interest in or any responsibility for the government or disposition of the overseas possessions of Germany, her rights and titles to which Germany renounces to the principal allied and associated powers under articles 119 to 127, inclusive.

"15. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions affect its honor or its vital interests and declares that such questions are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the league of nations or any agency thereof or to the decision or recommendation of any other power."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I now ask to take up for action paragraph No. 1. When I made my motion, I moved them all as the report of the committee, and I gave notice that I should ask for a vote on each paragraph. I now ask for a vote on the first paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that any Senator has a right to a division.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I ask permission to present reservations, in order that they may be printed and put upon the desks of Senators in the morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That action will be taken.

The reservations are as follows:

The Senate of the United States advises and consents to the ratification of said treaty with the following reservations and conditions, anything in the covenant of the league of nations and the treaty to the contrary notwithstanding:

When any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire which are also members of the league, the United States shall have representatives in the council and assembly, and in any labor conference or organization under the league or treaty, numerically equal to the aggregate number of representatives of such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire in such council and assembly of the league and labor conference or organization under the league or treaty; and such representatives of the United States shall have the same powers and rights as the representatives of said member and its self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire; and upon all matters whatsoever, except where a party to a dispute, the United States shall have votes in the council and assembly, and in any labor conference or organization under the league or treaty, numerically equal to the aggregate vote to which any such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire are entitled.

Whenever a case referred to the council or assembly involves a dispute between the United States and another member of the league whose self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire are also represented in the council or assembly, or between the United States and any dominion, colony, or part of any other member of the league, neither the disputant members nor any of their said dominions, colonies, or parts of empire shall have a vote upon any phase of the question.

Whenever the United States is a party to a dispute which is referred to the council or assembly and can not, because a party, vote upon such dispute, any other member of the council or assembly having self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire, also members, upon such dispute to which the United States is a party, or upon any phase of the question, shall have and cast for itself and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empires, all together, but one vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the first reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts on behalf of the committee.

The Secretary read as follows:

1. The reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate are to be made a part and a condition of the resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of said resolution of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the reservation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I wish very briefly to outline my reasons for voting against the first reservation.

If I understand that proposal correctly, it imposes a condition upon the principal allied powers whereby our ratification of the treaty is not to become effective until at least three of them shall accept the reservations which it is proposed to insert in our resolution of ratification. That, of course, means that if only two of the principal allied powers shall accept these reservations, the treaty will not be ratified at all. I am opposed, Mr. President, to imposing conditions upon the allied powers in our resolution of ratification. I do not pretend to be entirely familiar with the effect of a reservation in a resolution of ratification. But generally speaking, my understanding is that it differs from an amendment in that it may be accepted by acquiescence or otherwise by the other treaty-making or signatory powers; and that is as it should be.

Our exercise of the right to determine the conditions of ratification is a right the interference with which by any other nation we would resent, and I am inclined to think that if a resolution of ratification by one of the principal allied powers containing a similar preamble or condition should be laid before the Senate by the President, we would not regard it with equanimity. It would seem to dictate, or to be an announcement which would be the equivalent of, "Take it or leave it as you may determine; but unless it is taken with the condition the treaty will fail of ratification."

I do not believe, Mr. President, if we have the right, which may be conceded for the sake of argument, to attach such a condition to a resolution of ratification, that it consists with the comity and courtesy which should at all times prevail in the intercourse of nations with each other, and especially in reference to agreeing upon covenants which are to have the force of international law.

I prefer, therefore, Mr. President, that the reservations should be made in the ordinary course, and that the resolution of ratification should be silent on such a condition. If it be true that reservations do not require the affirmative action of the other signatory powers, but become a part of the treaty unless they are expressly rejected, then certainly these conditions are not necessary. If it be true that we are willing to accept the treaty with certain reservations, let us insert those reservations without adding any conditions whatever.

I am not concerned whether Great Britain or France or Italy or Japan shall act upon a condition or an alternative placed before them. What I am concerned with, and only concerned with, are such reservations as seem to me to be absolutely essential for the protection of the United States.

To my mind it is plain, and if I am mistaken I want to be corrected, that with the conditions set forth in the first so-called reservation as a part of the resolution of ratification, there can be no treaty, there can be no ratification, except by a compliance with the conditions which we have sought to impose upon other sovereign nations.

I shall for these reasons, Mr. President, vote against the first proposition.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, a similar provision asking for the acceptance of a reservation was adopted by the United States in the case of the cession of the Danish Islands. In the treaty with Denmark we inserted a reservation relating to the established church, which was a necessary reservation. We required that we should have the acceptance of that reservation by Denmark before the treaty became effective. The notes were exchanged as set forth in the President's proclamation. I have the President's proclamation here, which gives the whole thing. After stating the reservation in the proclamation, it says:

And whereas it was further provided in the said resolution "That the Senate advises and consents to the ratification of the said convention on condition that the attitude of the United States in this particular, as set forth in the above proviso, be made the subject of an exchange of notes between the Governments of the two high contracting parties, so as to make it plain that this condition is understood and accepted by the two Governments, the purpose hereof being to bring the said convention clearly within the constitutional powers of the United States * * *";

And whereas this condition has been fulfilled by notes exchanged between the two high contracting parties on January 3, 1917;

And whereas the said convention has been duly ratified on both parts, and the ratifications of the two Governments were exchanged in the city of Washington, on the 17th day of January 1917:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public—

And so forth.

There is, therefore, nothing new in this.

Mr. THOMAS. But, Mr. President, does not the Senator think there should be a distinction between a treaty which amounts to nothing more nor less than a contract between two nations for the purchase of territory, and a treaty like this, which involves nearly every subject under the sun, and which is designed as a treaty of peace to close the World War?

Mr. LODGE. I see no distinction whatever in principle. If we can make such a reservation to one power we can make it to others, and I do not see how by any ingenuity there can be found to be anything rude in asking for an exchange of notes. Of course, every one of these reservations, if they are adopted, is open to objection by the other signatories. The effect of this exchange of notes with three of the principal allied and associated powers would simply be to expedite the acceptance of the treaty. If they accept it, we need not fear objection from the others. The treaty would come into effect at once, and there would be no misunderstandings, which are to be avoided, in my judgment; and it seems to me a wise and necessary provision.

I can not understand the idea that there is anything rude in asking in a negotiation that powers should accept a reservation. I think this treaty is rather too important for us to consider questions of etiquette and manners. But there is no question of etiquette and manners here. It has been done before without any objection whatever. How could anybody take offense at it? I can not see the force of that objection. On the other hand, I think it is distinctly promotive of a prompt and good understanding. We are following precisely the precedent we ourselves set in the Danish treaty.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we are following to some extent the precedent established in the Danish treaty. We are not following to any extent the precedent established in any other treaty, so far as I can understand. This same matter was up before the Committee on Foreign Relations, not exactly in the same form in which it appears before the Senate at the present time, but in a form that meant precisely the same thing, and I wish to read from the reservations which have been printed, and which were first presented by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I expect to show, Mr. President, that there is a vice in this request for a formal acceptance that Senators have not probably given full consideration. As it appeared before the Committee on Foreign Relations, this is the way the preamble, which is now No. 1 of the reservations, read:

The committee also report the following reservations and understandings to be made a part and a conditon of the resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said following reservations and understandings have been accepted as a part and a condition of said instrument of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit: Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

When this matter was before the Committee on Foreign Relations, I moved to strike out all after the word "ratification," which would include "which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States" until these other powers shall formally accept our several reservations.

Mr. President, I again move to strike from No. 1 of the reservations all after the words "resolution of ratification." As I have not before me the original as it is now presented, I can not give the lines.

But, Mr. President, the preamble, or the introductory reservation, would then read:

The committee also report the following reservations and understandings to be made a part and a condition of the resolution of ratification.

So far, Mr. President, as this country is concerned, these retained words answer every possible legitimate purpose. They make it clear that the reservations are to be made a part and a condition of the resolution of ratification. To the extent that these reservations relieve the United States from any obligation under the compact, that compact is, in effect, modified so far as the United States is concerned. It is an amendment of the treaty so far as the United States is concerned. While it binds others, it binds us only to the extent by which we have bound ourselves in the acceptance of any particular article, and when we file our acceptance of this treaty, with its reservations, we make the reservations a part of the treaty, and every other nation must take cognizance of them whether we say another word or whether we ask them to do anything else. These reservations are just as much a part of this treaty as though they had been written into the body of the instrument in the first instance. No Senator, therefore, who seeks to compel other countries to any formal declaration of consent to these reservations would have the audacity to claim that such an acceptance is necessary to give validity or effect to our reservations. It is not necessary.

They know, as everyone knows, that if our acceptance is a qualified one, we have modified it in so far as our interests are concerned to the extent of the qualification, and every other party to the treaty must take cognizance of the extent to which we have bound ourselves and the extent to which we have freed ourselves from any one of the obligations or the provisions of the treaty.

I believe that not a single supporter of this preamble, in the form proposed by the committee, would ever contend upon the floor of the Senate or elsewhere that the failure of any or the failure of all of these other nations to the treaty, these parties to the contract, to formally declare their acquiescence in it in any possible way would in the slightest degree detract from their effectiveness.

It is worse, then, than idle to say that this is proposed to the end that there shall be no misunderstanding in the future. It is deceptive of the real purpose of the provisions. This resolution of reservation, with its conditions and qualifications, as I have stated, becomes a part of the instrument and will be filed with it, and it will have just exactly the same meaning and be just as binding upon the other powers whether those powers say "Yes" or whether those powers refrain from saying anything. No one in the Senate doubts that.

While we have in one or two instances—and I can only find one in my examination—asked for the acceptance of a reservation from the other party to the contract, it has been only where there has been one party, and only where the question was one of the United States being compelled to notify the other party that under our Constitution we could not adopt a state religion for any islands which we purchased, and we wished them to fully recognize that that could not be done under the Constitution, and therefore we asked an exchange of notes upon that subject.

It is clearly evident, however, Mr. President, that an entirely different purpose, a purpose entirely outside of the necessity for formal acceptance of these reservations, is intended. The very first question that arises in our minds as we read this preamble is this: If assent of other powers is necessary that others should also understand it, why does the preamble limit the formal assent to three out of four? There are 32, I believe, who have signed the treaty. Why, if we want them all to understand it, do we say that three, naming them, out of a certain four shall accept it? If formal assent is necessary, why is it not just as necessary that each and every other party to the compact should give its formal assent, or, taking the first instance, why should we say that it should be done by at least three out of the four? Why not say that it should be done by all of the four instead of three out of the four?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think, if the Senator will pardon me, that this very number was arrived at because that is the identical language of the treaty, providing that the treaty itself shall go into full force and effect when ratified by three of the principal powers.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I do not see that that has the slightest thing to do with it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Connecticut fails to distinguish as to the character of these different parties. When the provision of three out of four was made in the treaty it related to the peace relations between those three and the common enemy. This provision relates to the status of the four allies themselves and our relation to them.

Mr. McCUMBER. And that is not all. That refers to the entire peace treaty, while this acceptance only refers to our particular reservation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not clearly understand the Senator from Ohio, so I may be covering the ground which he has already covered. I am interested in what the Senator from North Dakota is saying and I have been very much in doubt as to what this particular preamble, if you call it such, means. Suppose these reservations were agreed to by Japan, Italy, and France. That would be three. First, would the reservations be in force as to Great Britain?

Mr. McCUMBER. They would not. That is not all; the treaty would not be in force.

Mr. NORRIS. If that is true, it seems to me, since the treaty itself provides that it shall be in force as to three when they have agreed to it, and if it should happen to be a different three, we might have a bad situation. What kind of a dilemma would we be in with the treaty in a situation of that kind?

Mr. McCUMBER. This is an expression of our ratification of the treaty. Now, though the Senate ratifies the treaty, it places it in the hands of another country by its silence to avoid the ratification of the United States. That is the vicious part of it. But I wish to follow the thread of my argument to arrive at what was really intended.

Mr. President, throughout the long discussion of reservations by the Committee on Foreign Relations a majority of that committee have insistently, and I may say also consistently, opposed any wording in the reservation that would give the language of the treaty a construction that would be binding on all members of the treaty. They declared that this was not our purpose, that we were concerned only with the construction which we should apply to the treaty wherever we were concerned, and if other nations were willing to abide by a different construction between themselves, that was their exclusive concern, and it was none of our affair. So we declare in our reservations, "The United States so understands and construes," "the United States reserves to itself," "the United States assumes no obligations," "the United States will not submit," and so forth. We everywhere purposely refrain from either binding or asking any other nation to be bound as between themselves by our reservations.

As there can be no legal necessity for any formal acceptance of our reservations by other powers, there must be some other thought or sentiment responsible for this demand. We do not need to look very far to find it. It has manifested itself in nearly every proposed amendment. Like a gliding serpent, it is now concealed and now revealed throughout all of the different phrases of the reservations prepared by the committee.

It is the sentiment of malice, of hatred toward the covenant, which is so great that it irresistibly seeks to vent itself upon the wounded and bleeding nations, who, in their anguish and misery beyond description, have sought by this instrument to prevent a recurrence of such an awful tragedy to their country.

We have not been satisfied to demand special rights and privileges. We have demanded them in words of haughtiness and abruptness and inconsiderateness that could not but leave a sting.

Harsh and stern as were the terms necessarily imposed upon Germany by this treaty, the language of the victor toward the vanquished was far more considerate and moderate than that often used to evidence our dissent from features of the treaty prepared by our own envoys in conjunction with those of other friendly powers.

Now, undoubtedly the hardest clause of this treaty and the one most repugnant to the sensitiveness and the pride of the German envoys was that which compelled them to publicly declare and accept for their country the sole responsibility for this ungodly war and all the loss and damage resulting therefrom, which exacted from them a plea of guilty of all of the offenses and all of the atrocities they committed in this sanguinary conflict. Yet, Mr. President, we and our allies deemed this admission necessary and proper not only as a justification, but as a basis for assessing damages against the German Empire and her allies.

There, however, we were dealing with an enemy whose conduct during the war had been most cruel and shocking. Recognizing bitterness on the part of those who suffered from those atrocities, it was most natural that language should be firm and should be even dictatorial.

But in this treaty we are dealing with our allies, with those whom we called friends as long as they were fighting our battle with us, those who not only fought with us but did most of the fighting, most of the dying, most of the suffering in defense of a great world principle, in a war which we acknowledged was, in its ultimate possibilities, as much our war as it was the war of any other country. Now, why should we treat them as a hated enemy?

If we must insist upon rights and privileges on our part which are not accorded other nations, if we must compel all the other members to occupy a position of inferiority, if, in order to secure our consent to this league of nations, it is necessary for them to surrender their own equality, why should we seek to make them come out publicly and openly and make acknowledgment that in their dire distress, so impoverished by this war that they dare not contemplate the possibility of another, they are compelled to acknowledge that our support of the league to prevent its recurrence could only be purchased by conceding to us special rights and special privileges?

If it is not necessary, why should we seek any exultant joy in compelling them publicly to swallow their bitter pill? I confess I can not understand this spirit.

Article 10 of the treaty imposes a moral obligation upon every member of the compact to protect the territorial integrity and political independence of every other member from external aggression. By our second reservation we excuse ourselves from such obligation unless our Congress in its wisdom should so declare when the occasion arises. That is probably one of the most important obligations to be found in the league of nations provisions. We hold ourselves aloof from these other nations. They are bound to come to the defense of any other nation whose territory is invaded for an aggressive purpose by any other nation, but under our reservation we are not compelled to do so.

Again, under the terms of the treaty, while purely domestic concerns are withheld from consideration by either council or assembly, whether the dispute does or does not involve an international matter, must, under the treaty, necessarily in the end be decided by the council or assembly. In other words, if a controversy arises as to whether a question is a domestic or an international question, the council or the assembly must, under the treaty as it now stands, determine that question. But by the fourth reservation we can hold ourselves superior to those rules which would govern other members of the compact and reserve to ourselves exclusively the right to decide what questions are within our domestic jurisdiction and what questions are without it. The same thing is true in respect to the Monroe doctrine. While the treaty excepts the Monroe doctrine from consideration, questions might naturally arise whether a dispute would fall within the scope of the Monroe doctrine, and that would necessarily require a decision by the council or the assembly as to what the Monroe doctrine is. But here again we place ourselves above and superior to our copartners in this world league and maintain that the United States is to be the sole judge whether a matter falls within the Monroe doctrine.

I am not claiming that that is not as it should be; but what I am insisting upon is that we hold a position superior to that of the other nations in that respect, and necessarily place them in an inferior position before this brotherhood of great nations.

Mr. President, there are numerous other provisions in our reservations which reserve to ourselves rights and privileges not accorded other members of the league. Such special privileges, of course, destroy the equality principle in the league of nations. The other nations, dealing with each other with entire equality, granting and reserving no privilege that is not granted or reserved to others, must necessarily feel a degree of chagrin if not of resentment at our assumed superiority. But, measuring the benefits which they hope to secure by this agreement and recognizing that they have been nearly bankrupted by this war, they will undoubtedly bow their pride and acquiesce in the conditions we impose. Under those circumstances ought we not to exhibit a spirit of generosity? That is all. Ought we not to be just a little considerate of those countries and at least allow them the right of silent acquiescence, which we have allowed in every other treaty where we have made reservations, except, possibly, the one with reference to the Danish Islands?

There have been a number of occasions in our own history when a President has found it necessary either to allow a bill to become a law without his signature or to veto it. Often a President may find in a bill that which is repugnant to his idea of right and justice, but he may find other things in the bill which are absolutely necessary for the carrying on of governmental functions, as, for instance, in the case of bills to raise revenue and appropriations bills. He does not wish to give his adherence to the one objectionable provision, and, therefore, he allows the bill to become a law by acquiescence, by allowing it to remain for 10 days without putting his signature to it. I can recall the case of a revenue bill having been so treated by President Cleveland, and other similar cases might be cited.

Do you not think, Mr. President, that the least we can do, if we adopt these reservations, is to allow the other countries to acquiesce in our construction and our special privileges, without an attempt to "rub it in," for that is really all there is in this?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has the Senator from North Dakota explained just what he considers will amount to acquiescence?

Mr. McCUMBER. Anything which is done under the treaty, any action taken under it by the other powers, the appointment of commissions, the making of no objection whatever; their silence would be equivalent to acquiescence. We have again and again ratified treaties in which we have made special reservations, and no exchange of notes has passed between us and other nations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If they should be notified by our Government of these reservations and yet made no objection, the Senator would consider that an acquiescence?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; and they would be bound by the treaty. They will make no objections, because they can not make objections. I do not think, as some Senators believe, that the treaty would go back to the peace conference if we leave it in that way; and I prefer to leave it in that way. If the Senator from Georgia and myself have such relations between us that he is in a position to exact from me conditions which he knows place me in an inferior position to himself, as a considerate gentleman he would allow me at least to accept his proposal without compelling me to come out and acknowledge that he is my superior and that I must under the exigencies of the case accord to him superior rights.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the Senator would have in the resolution of ratification a provision that the provisos shall become a part of such ratification?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly. I leave that in.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So that the ratification would not be binding except with the provisos?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes; they become a part of the treaty; there is no question about that. I leave in the first reservation these words:

> The committee also report the following reservations and understandings to be made a part and a condition of the resolution of ratification.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As a condition of such ratification?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is a condition of the ratification. All the reservations are a condition of the ratification. In other words, we ratify the treaty with these conditions, and therefore they become a part of the ratification and a part of the treaty itself.

While we have been voting down amendments because we wished to avoid further delay and believe we can accomplish everything we seek by proper reservations, we are to be trapped into the same situation by compelling a ratification of the reservations by the other powers. I know that since first written the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has changed the method of the assent of the other powers by providing that it shall be by a mere exchange of notes, but, after all, it means practically the same thing.

Mr. President, dull indeed must be he who fails to comprehend that there can be no possible difference between compelling a reconsideration to accept particular reservations and compelling a reconsideration by reason of amendments. If the acceptance of these reservations must be had by each nation separately without reconvening the peace conference, then amendments could be dealt with exactly in the same way by each one of the separate nations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him another question?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Are not some of the reservations that we contemplate making—at least, some that I contemplate supporting—such as involve entirely our own conduct inside of this country as between the act of the President and the act of Congress? Ought we to call on the foreign nations to express any opinion at all about such a question? Is that not another reason why it is desirable that there should be merely acquiescence rather than formally expressed approval?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. I was going to mention that further on, but I can refer to it right now. The reservations provide how we shall appoint members to various committees or commissions and provide that no appointment shall be made until Congress has provided for it by law. That is not a matter of any concern whatever to the other countries; that is our own concern. We should not ask them to acquiesce in our congressional acts or in congressional acts which we propose to provide for in the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or to formally express approval of them.

Mr. McCUMBER. The other apparent purpose, I say candidly, is to defeat the treaty by this unique process. In other words, we are to ratify the treaty by the United States Senate, and leave a string in the hands of a foreign power to undo what the United States has done. That is exactly what it means. It is a surrender to those who will vote against the treaty. It is a new method of killing the treaty after we have adopted it. Those who have formulated this provision have done so with the hope that any action of the Senate in ratifying this treaty may be undone and the ratification changed into a rejection by us by reason of the failure of certain other nations to accept formally our special reservations.

No one can doubt that. All that can be said in defense of it is that we have only put it in the hands of four powers to set aside our ratification, instead of placing it in the hands of all of them.

The authors of this preamble know that if the sixth one of these reservations, for instance, should pass the Senate, Japan could not and would not formally accept it. That would put Japan out of the case entirely. They understand that, and that is why they use the language that the reservations shall be accepted by three out of the four. They ought to know that it could not possibly be covered up if you said all of them, because they understand as well as any Senator understands that it would be impossible for Japan, if she is a nation to be respected by her own people, to have the United States take from her territory that she obtained through the struggle in this great war, to deprive her of her right of conquest.

That would put Japan out. It would also, in my opinion, put Italy out. Italy to-day is smarting under her failure to secure Fiume; and should she decline openly to vote to give the United States these special privileges, although naturally she would take no steps to negative our action, such nonaction on her part would nullify our acceptance. Now, why should we place in the hands of Italy the power to nullify a ratification by the Senate of the United States?

Or suppose France should say, "While we are so situated that we can not oppose these special privileges and reservations by the United States, and while we will accept them in silence, we can not afford to say to our people, by any positive action or legislation, that we do not come into this league of nations on an equality with the greatest power in it." Any failure on the part of France to acknowledge formally our superior claims would change our acceptance into a rejection, because that is the way the preamble reads.

I can not understand, Mr. President, how any Senator who could vote against amendments, for any of the reasons that have been given for voting against them, can now turn around and vote for this preamble proposition, designed to effectuate the very purpose which by his vote he declared should not be effectuated, namely, the final defeat of this treaty.

There can be no question, Mr. President, as to the meaning of this preamble, because it says "which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings" have been accepted as a part and condition of the resolution of ratification by these other powers. The ratification is not to take effect until then. In other words, when we vote for the ratification of this treaty we have not voted for its ratification. We have voted to hold it in abeyance until three out of four other powers shall say that the ratification of the United States Senate shall have effect.

Is it not the most unique proposition that was ever put up to the Senate of the United States—this effort to defeat the solemn ratification of a treaty by putting into the hands of four foreign powers the rope that is to strangle it? I can not vote for that proposition, Mr. President.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have voted very consistently against all of the amendments that have been proposed to the pending treaty. I have voted against them mainly for two reasons, which I have partially explained from time to time upon the floor of the Senate—one as a matter of expedition in disposing of the treaty; the other, a conviction that the Senate of the United States was primarily concerned when considering the treaty in positively and absolutely protecting the independence and sovereignty of our own country, rather than attempting to rewrite the document which in effect we would be doing by amending it textually, and being unequipped with the information necessary to rewrite it. By an amendment, we attempt to control another's destiny; by a reservation, we are only asserting our own position. But in voting against amendments I have stated, and want to take this opportunity to reiterate, that I do not want any question, so far as my vote is concerned, as to the protection of the independence and sovereignty of our own country; and in considering reservations which are now coming before us I hope the reservations will thoroughly protect this country in the manner that it must be protected.

This is too important a matter, Mr. President, to depend even upon precedent—the precedent that silence means acquiescence. I believe precedent has established that in similar negotiations; but this is not a negotiation between two nations. It is a negotiation or a covenant between practically all of the nations of the world; and, so far as I am concerned, when we adopt reservations—which we will, I am sure, and which we must, so far as my vote for final ratification is concerned—I can see no logical reason why we should not, through a courteous exchange of notes, at least, have those reservations agreed to by a majority of the nations involved.

It seems to me it is a matter that hardly merits argument. If they object or any one of them objects to the reservations we make or to any one of the reservations we make, and will not join with us because of that objection, they certainly must say so. They must reduce it to writing. If they do not object, then there can be no reason in the world why likewise they should not say so.

Therefore, even though silence may be acquiescence, and thus treaty negotiations be understood and their understandings carried out, in a matter so important as this, practically forming a new government, I think we owe it to the people of the United States that when we complete our reservations at least an exchange of notes in agreement from three of the four other powers should be demanded by this country.

I feel, again trying to emphasize my position as I look upon reservations as compared to amendments, that we can not go too far. I will qualify that. I do not mean that we can go so far with reservations as to render impossible a league of nations. I am not prepared for that, because I want to see a league of nations, and I want to see it function, and I want to see the moral influence of this country exerted. As we evaded no responsibility in war, we should not in times of peace. But I believe these reservations should be so positive that we will have an anchor to windward now, so that, when any question is raised, our representative in the league of nations or in the council will be in such a position that the honor of this country will be in no way involved in a position that he may take under our reservations.

This certainly involves no humiliation on the part of our allies. In making our reservations we in no way deny them a like privilege.

Therefore, in a matter so important, I can not conceive how the Senate would be doing its full duty, if a majority of this body agree that reservations shall be made, not to have that frankly and positively understood by an ordinary exchange of diplomatic notes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the instance which the Senator from Massachusetts cited a few moments ago in support of the authority of the Government to require an express acquiescence in such reservations as we may attach to our resolution of ratification does not seem to me to be an apposite one. I differ from the Senator from Massachusetts upon subjects of international concern and the exercise of the treaty-making power with a good deal of hesitation, for the Senator's experience and the long time of his service in the Senate of the United States give him the right to speak by authority.

I am unable, however, to perceive the analogy between the imposition of a condition to the ratification of a treaty with one nation, the object of which is to secure territory by purchase, and which partakes, therefore, of a purely commercial nature, and the situation which confronts us in our consideration of such a treaty as this. This is a document prepared by 32 nations on one side and 1 nation on the other, and the condition which this first reservation imposes is not imposed upon Germany, which is the other party to the document, but upon our own allies and associates, with whom we have so far conditionally agreed.

It would seem that the mere statement of such a difference was conclusive of the proposition. But if it is not, then, as was well said by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], there can be no logic or consistency in requiring the assent or the ratification of but 3 of these 32 powers as necessary to make our ratification effective. I am unable to perceive why, if any such express assent by one or more of our associates is necessary, it is not more necessary to demand the same assent from Germany.

Had there been other analogies or precedents, I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] would have given them to the Senate. The fact that there is but one, and that concerning a treaty for the purchase of the Virgin Islands, and the condition being one which our Government deemed essential to the consummation of the purchase, it should stand upon a far different basis morally and in dignity from an agreement like this, which seeks to conserve the common interests of 32 nations in a treaty of peace following the close of the greatest war of history.

I again say, Mr. President, that we should concern and content ourselves with the imposition in our resolution of ratification of every reservation which in our judgment is necessary to safeguard and protect our interests, leaving it to our associate nations to act as they may choose concerning these reservations, and without virtually notifying them in advance that unless a certain number of them accept these reservations there will be no treaty.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, November 7, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, November 6, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We invoke Thy blessing, Father in heaven, upon all the proceedings of this House, that every question which presents itself may be wisely, justly, amicably disposed of, with perfect urbanity, kindness, and good will among its Members; that the problems disposed of may redound to the good of all and advance the interests of the Commonwealth. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had concurred in the following concurrent resolution:

House concurrent resolution 36.

Whereas the steamship Lake Daraga is expected to arrive in New York on or about November 9, bearing the first bodies of American soldiers from the fields of the World War; and

Whereas it is proper and fitting that due recognition be given to the return to our shores of the mortal remains of those men who gave their lives for the cause of freedom: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a committee of six Members of the House of Representatives, to be selected by the Speaker, and six Members of the Senate, to be selected by the President of the Senate, be appointed to represent the Congress at such appropriate ceremonies at the port of New York as may be determined upon as proper and appropriate.

That the expenses of said committee and of the ceremonies arranged by it shall be paid one-half out of the contingent fund of the House and one-half out of the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers to be signed by the chairman of the House and Senate committees, respectively.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment H. J. Res. 241, to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the year 1919.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 7751. An act authorizing the sale of inherited and unpartitioned allotments for town-site purposes in the Quapaw Agency, Okla.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] be permitted to address the House for 35 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] be permitted to address the House for 35 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am advised that there is a matter coming up here that I think is more or less pertinent to what the gentleman from Louisiana desires to talk about. There will be an hour of general debate on a side. Can not the gentleman get in on general debate?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He would if somebody over there did not rise up and object to what he was saying and get into a wrangle and waste his time.

Mr. REAVIS. If I understand it correctly, under the rule the general debate will not be confined to the subject matter of the resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman object to this?

Mr. REAVIS. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Louisiana can get in under general debate, I object.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for——

A QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a quorum here. I make the point of no quorum. If a man on this side of the House can not get a few minutes in which to address the House, I think we ought to get a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and eighty-four Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

SURPLUS ARMY MOTOR VEHICLES.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I submit the following resolution from the Committee on Rules and ask that it be agreed to. I ask that the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall take up for consideration House resolution 362, being a resolution providing for the distribution and sale of surplus Army motor vehicles; that there shall be two hours of debate on the resolution, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DONOVAN]; that during the debate it shall be in order to offer amendments which shall be pending; that at the conclusion of the debate the amendments shall be voted upon in the order in which they are offered; that at the conclusion of the voting on said amendments the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and amendments to final passage, without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] desire any time?

Mr. GARRETT. After a few moments I suggest that the gentleman move the previous question; then we shall have 20 minutes on a side.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will state that I am opposed to this.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, there is no request for time. I move the previous question.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. At what stage would it be permissible to offer amendments to the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It depends on whether the previous question is ordered or not. It would not be in order until it is read, at any rate.

Mr. HARRISON. The resolution provides that amendments must be offered during general debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not debate it. It depends on whether the previous question is ordered.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] is referring to the resolution that this rule makes in order. This is upon the rule, not upon the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman. That question will not be for the Speaker to decide. That will be for the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to decide.

Mr. HARRISON. What I want to know is at what time amendments can be offered?

The SPEAKER. That will be for the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to control.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. At any time during the debate?

The SPEAKER. Upon examining the resolution, the Chair sees that he was mistaken. The resolution does not provide for going into Committee of the Whole. The amendments will be considered according to the rule during the general debate.

Mr. HARRISON. The point I desire to inquire about is whether the resolution is open for any Member of the House to offer amendments, and as to the time when he will have the right to offer them; whether it should be done now or afterwards?

The SPEAKER. Not until after the resolution is adopted.

Mr. KREIDER. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the previous question on the adoption of the rule.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to debate the resolution, because it is self-explanatory, and two hours' debate are provided under the rule.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, in view of the confusion which existed in the House at the time the resolution was read, I think it will be well to state briefly just what it means. There has been reported to the House from the Special Committee on Expenditures in the War Department a resolution which was reported to the full committee by the subcommittee on quartermaster's expenditures presented by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], requesting the Secretary of War to send to the State highway commissions those motor vehicles that have been requisitioned for use in road building, and to sell the other vehicles that have been up to this time, and shall hereafter be, declared to be surplus. This is a rule to make the consideration of that resolution in order. The rule provides that there shall be two hours of general debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] and one-half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DONOVAN]; that during the general debate amendments to the Reavis resolution may be offered, and that they shall be voted upon at the conclusion of the general debate in the order in which they are offered, and that then the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the Reavis resolution and all amendments thereto to final passage, without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is it necessary under this rule that a man shall have time yielded to him in order to offer an amendment?

Mr. GARRETT. That question was asked in the Committee on Rules, and it was thought that it might be done in that way, and that the resolution would be construed to mean that if a Member did not have time yielded to him before the conclusion of the general debate he should have an opportunity to offer amendments before the previous question was voted upon.

Mr. WALSH. Can it be interpreted in that way?

Mr. GARRETT. That was the construction placed upon it by the majority members of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KITCHIN. Under that construction, could they discuss the amendments?

Mr. GARRETT. No. This is a House resolution. The House will not go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of it. It is a simple House resolution. The minority are not objecting to the consideration of this resolution from the Committee on Rules——

Mr. WALSH. Does not the rule provide that the previous question shall be considered as ordered after two hours?

Mr. GARRETT. No; it provides that after the amendments are disposed of, then the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is the discussion confined to the resolution in the general debate?

Mr. GARRETT. It is not. It simply says there shall be two hours of debate on the resolution.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, is it the gentleman's construction that after the general debate shall be concluded gentlemen may nevertheless be recognized in their own right to offer amendments?

Mr. GARRETT. That was the impression, as I understand, of the majority members of the Committee on Rules. I myself in the committee asked that question, because I wanted to be sure that opportunity would be presented, and that was the construction of the majority members of the Committee on Rules. Now, as I was about to say, the minority are not objecting to this resolution nor objecting to its coming at this time if the majority party desire to sidetrack the very important banking bill that is pending in order to take this matter up for consideration. Of course, the majority party are responsible; we are not responsible.

Mr. RAKER. I want to ask the gentleman whether this would be binding upon the Secretary as a law would be?

Mr. GARRETT. It is a simple request, a simple House resolution. There is no law at all involved in the Reavis resolution. It is a simple request of the Secretary of War.

Mr. RAKER. The Senate has nothing whatever to do with it?

Mr. GARRETT. Nothing whatever. It is a simple House resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee the question that I asked the Speaker, whether at the conclusion of the general debate any Member will have the opportunity of offering amendments?

Mr. GARRETT. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, as I said in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and other gentlemen who propounded a similar inquiry, that that question was asked—I think by myself; at any rate, I know it was asked in the Committee on Rules, and the majority members of the Committee on Rules held that amendments could be offered; that if a Member did not get time yielded to him during the general debate for the purpose of offering an amendment, immediately upon the conclusion of the two hours of talk a chance would be given to offer it, but there will be no chance to debate the amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I ask unanimous consent that that shall be the construction adopted by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield a moment? I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee why he does not make this a concurrent resolution; why it would not be better to do that? It has not the effect of law, as I understand it.

Mr. GARRETT. It has not. I happen to be a member of the Committee on Expenditures, but I am not a member of the subcommittee that reported the resolution, and had nothing to do with its preparation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This may properly come up on discussion of the resolution, but I am asking the gentleman a question for information. Has the department refused to turn over to the Department of Agriculture any of these vehicles?

Mr. GARRETT. I am not informed on that question. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the construction placed upon the rule by the gentleman from Tennessee as to offering amendments be adopted by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that in construing the rule amendments shall be held to be in order at the conclusion of the general debate. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Reserving the right to object, with the understanding that the amendments are not debatable.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; with that understanding.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I really see no objection that can be urged against the resolution, if properly amended, except that it will not have the force of law. All the States in this Union, I believe nearly every one of them, has entered on a very large road-building program. I am informed by the Bureau of Public Roads of the Agricultural Department that $750,000,000 is to be dedicated this year to public roads, and that many of these States have made their appropriations upon the theory that they will get the benefit of the act that was passed at the last session by which this surplus material, owned by the Government, used in road construction was to be distributed among them.

This resolution, it seems to me, is harmful in this. I propose to vote for it with amendments, but I think it is harmful in that it confines the request to those vehicles which are now declared as surplus. The figures that I put in the RECORD yesterday show unquestionably that hereafter there will be a large number of motor vehicles that will be declared surplus. There is also five or six million dollars' worth of other road-building material which under the law enacted at the last Congress should be distributed among the States. If this resolution has any force or effect, it will be to narrow the force of that statute by confining it to motor-propelled vehicles now declared surplus. It will not embrace material useful for road-building purposes that the statute left it discretionary with the Secretary of War to distribute, among which were these motor vehicles and other material.

He has announced positively that in the exercise of his discretion he would not include anything but the motor vehicles which have already been declared surplus. So, unless some mandatory statute is enacted, the States will be deprived of road-building material which under the provisions of the former law would be applicable to road-building purposes. The resolution simply indorses the action which the Secretary of War has taken, and will be an authority to him not to distribute the road-building material, such as motor propelled, and is not included in matters already declared surplus.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman to tell the House in general what other kinds of material he has in mind?

Mr. HARRISON. There are a large number of scrapers, donkey engines, industrial railroads, hods, rock crushers, and articles of that character which have been used by the War Department for road-building purposes.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Does that include the caterpillar tractors?

Mr. HARRISON. There are $40,000 worth of these tractors waiting the decision of this Congress. On that matter the Military Affairs Committee has already reported a bill, and all that the Rules Committee had to do was to take that bill and bring it before Congress.

Mr. REAVIS. I do not know that I understood the gentleman correctly. Did the gentleman state that the present resolution provided only for motor-propelled vehicles now declared surplus?

Mr. HARRISON. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. REAVIS. The resolution says "and that all Army motor vehicles now or hereafter declared surplus."

Mr. HARRISON. You limit it to a number.

Mr. REAVIS. Yes; and it provides for "22,195 motor vehicles, for which requisition has heretofore been made by the Secretary of Agriculture, and that all other Army motor vehicles now or hereafter declared surplus be immediately offered for sale at public auction."

Mr. HARRISON. But you disregard the needs of the Public Health Service and the Post Office Department.

Mr. REAVIS. I think the gentleman will change his mind when he finds out the number of vehicles.

Mr. HARRISON. I produced certain tables yesterday, which I got from the Director of Sales, and these I have substantially had verified by Gen. Drake, of the Motor Transport Corps.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. BROWNE. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this resolution. It simply confines it to 22,135 motor vehicles——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, the bill that has been favorably reported out by the Committee on Military Affairs not only includes motor vehicles but it also includes all road machinery, loaders, hoisting cables, and a great many things that this resolution does not cover.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true.

Mr. BROWNE. Does the gentleman know that a bill similar to the one passed in the Committee on Military Affairs of the House has passed the Senate and is now before the House?

Mr. HARRISON. I understand so.

Mr. BROWNE. Does not the gentleman think that we will get more effective legislation if we pass these two bills than if we pass this resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. This resolution does not amount to anything. The Secretary of War replies that he is already carrying out its purpose.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, this resolution as proposed is simply a House resolution which "requests" the Secretary of War to deliver to the Secretary of Agriculture for distribution among the highway departments of the several States, for use on roads constructed in whole or in part by Federal aid, the 22,195 motor vehicles for which requisition has heretofore been made by the Secretary of Agriculture, and that all other Army motor vehicles now or hereafter declared surplus be immediately offered for sale at public auction to the American people.

It seems to me that better results would have been obtained if this had been a concurrent or a joint resolution, or if we had taken up the bill which passed the Senate on October 22 or the bill which is on the calendar unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, which provides for the distribution of motor trucks and all other available material for road-building purposes throughout the States. In the report on the pending resolution you will see it is stated that about 25 per cent of the motor vehicles have been distributed to the States, some of them receiving their full quota, whereas other States have received only a small proportion of that which they are entitled to. If that statement is correct, that is unjust. The law should be so drawn and administered so that all States shall receive their proportionate quota in accordance with the regulations, in accordance with the proportion of money that goes to the various States for road-building purposes. This resolution ought to be amended. I understand that amendments will be offered to it which will enlarge its provisions in order that larger benefits from it may be secured, and I hope such amendments when proposed will be adopted.

If these motor vehicles are sold, they will bring very little clear money for the Government, whereas if they are distributed to the States to be used for road-improvement purposes some good results will be obtained throughout the several States. What I am anxious to obtain is the distribution of this material which can be used for road improvement in the several States. I will vote for any resolution or bill that will secure that result. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, the previous question having been ordered, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CALDWELL) there were—ayes 93, noes 3.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-eight Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The Clerk called the roll, and there were—yeas 267, nays 3, answered "present" 4, not voting 158, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. Under the rule the House proceeds to the consideration of House joint resolution 362, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 362.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested to immediately deliver to the Secretary of Agriculture, for distribution among the highway departments of the several States, for use on roads constructed in whole or in part by Federal aid, the 22,195 motor vehicles for which requisition has heretofore been made by the Secretary of Agriculture, and that all other Army motor vehicles now or hereafter declared surplus be immediately offered for sale at public auction to the American people.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, the previous question was adopted on this resolution before it was called to my attention that I was placed in charge of the time on this side of the aisle. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] is chairman of the committee. As a matter of right, he is entitled to control the time, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] may control the hour on this side instead of myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] may control the time. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if this resolution is passed it will be an absolute futile act on the part of this House until a bill that has been reported by the Military Affairs Committee of the House, and which has already been passed——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then I object, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CALDWELL. I make the point of order.

Mr. REAVIS. I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of order is dilatory.

Mr. CALDWELL. It is not dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that inasmuch as the vote has just been held, and no business has been transacted——

Mr. CALDWELL. But business has been transacted since that time.

The SPEAKER. No business has been transacted. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, subcommittee No. 4 of the committee on investigation of expenditures in the War Department has thought it wise to bring to your attention and request the passage by you of this resolution requesting the War Department to dispose of automobiles that are now in its possession. We feel that there should be a greater degree of activity upon the part of the War Department in supplying the Department of Agriculture with the automobiles that they have requisitioned for use in road building and there should also be a greater degree of activity in turning into cash the surplus automobiles that will be on hand after the needs of the road-building department are complied with.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I can not yield now. They had on hand at the time of the armistice, including those delivered after the signing of the armistice, something like $163,000,000 in value of motor vehicles within this country. Seventy thousand machines were delivered after the signing of the armistice. The number on hand is not determined by the testimony. At one stage in the testimony it was stated that we had something like 130,000 trucks, passenger automobiles, side cars, motor cycles, and so forth, or motor equipment. The last statement was that we had 108,000. It is the intention to keep for the use of the Army approximately 52,000 motor vehicles of various kinds and also to retain 10 per cent for replacement based upon an army of 500,000 men. The balance is to be distributed, under various acts or resolutions that have been passed by this House and the Congress, to the Department of Agriculture and other departments of the Government. The Post Office Department has received a large number, the Public Health Service has received a large number, and many other departments of the Government have received numbers of motor vehicles, many of them, I personally believe, in excess of the absolute needs of the departments. The Agricultural Department has made requisition for about 22,181 machines. Up to the last report 8,447 have been delivered, and the various States are clamoring for expedition in the delivery of these motor vehicles to their States for road-work purposes.

I do not know if there is any intention to sell to the general public any substantial number of motor vehicles except nonserviceable or nonstandard cars.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I can not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MACGREGOR. All of us are unfortunately familiar with the matter of responsibility in any department, and this chasing responsibility around is, I imagine, considerably like the boys across the seas chasing the cooties; you think you have them and then you have not. And so this testimony in reference to the disposition of automobiles is like chasing the cooties. We have not fixed the responsibility on any particular person in the Department of War, but the Secretary of War certainly should be the boss of his department and ought to be in a position to say, "Go and do it now." A surplus was declared by Gen. March April 15, 1919, of 36,352 motor vehicles, and according to the statement of Gen. Drake, these various departments down here have been holding debates among themselves since that time to determine how it was going to be done, and they have not reached any conclusion. But we desire, so far as our committee is concerned, and I think all the Members of this House, that they should go and do it instead of holding these debates, and they should get these motor vehicles that have been apportioned to the States into the hands of the State officials, so that they can use them, if they are valuable, as Congress desires that they should be used.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I can not yield, unfortunately. I concur with Gen. Drake upon that propositon. Gen. Drake is the most forward one—I do not want to make any comparison, but he has been forward about the proposition that these States——

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield to a question for information?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I can not. I have not the time.

Gen. Drake expressed the opinion that these automobiles ought to have been disposed of immediately after the declaration of the armistice, and that they should have been turned into cash for the benefit of the American people and the money put into the Treasury in order to cut down some of this great debt we are laboring under. And I thoroughly agree with him in that proposition. We must get over the idea of spending the people's money recklessly and giving things away and throwing things away. All over this country there have been thousands and thousands of automobiles standing out, unprotected, going to waste, rusting away, and the departments are doing nothing to cut down this great debt under which we are laboring. Here, as I said, were $163,000,000 worth of automobiles which were on hand in this country at the time of the armistice, and nothing whatever has been done to any great extent to apply that great sum to the reduction of our debt. Our people are entitled to have something done along that line.

One of our colleagues has handed to me a letter from a constituent of his with reference to the conditions existing at Camp Holabird upon the occasion of his visit to that camp on October 30, 1919. He says:

> But what surprised us most was to see the thousands and thousands of fine new trucks of the very best make standing all over the fields or boxed for shipment lying idle, and nothing apparently being done to make them available for use to anyone. It is nothing less than a crime to have millions of dollars' worth of good material like this simply rusting away.

There is another proposition involved in this. In the Motor Transport Corps there are 25,000 civilian employees taking care of these thousands of automobiles, and if any of you gentlemen want to get a real idea, just go down here to Camp Holabird and look over those fields of automobiles standing there out in the weather and going to waste. Twenty-five thousand civilian employees, at 45 cents an hour, according to my way of figuring, costs pretty nearly $100,000 a day. It will be perfectly possible with the carrying out of the idea of disposing of these automobiles to the various departments and disposing of the balance to the public that we could do away with a part of this immense army of civilian employees. All that we desire is to convey to the War Department, to the Secretary of War, the feeling and desire upon the part of the Members of this House that there should be some expedition in the carrying out of the desires of Congress with reference to the distribution of these automobiles to the various departments, and that what are left should be sold to the general public, to the end that that money may be turned into the Treasury for the benefit of the people of the country.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes; I will yield now.

Mr. BROWNE. What objection has the gentleman to the bill that has already passed the Senate (S. 3037) and has already passed the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, which provides for giving this service to these departments mentioned, and also provides for all other road materials not included in this resolution, such as——

Mr. MACGREGOR. Road machinery, and so forth.

Mr. BROWNE. Steam shovels, dump wagons, hoisting machines, and other road-building materials? What objection does the gentleman make to that?

Mr. MACGREGOR. We make no objection to it.

Mr. BROWNE. Then, what is the reason for substituting this resolution and pushing it in ahead of this bill, which has already passed the Senate and passed the Committee on Military Affairs of the House?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Does that provide for giving more motor vehicles to the various departments?

Mr. BROWNE. All the surplus that the Agricultural Department can use.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I do not believe in that, because they would have all their employees riding in automobiles.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Certainly.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman consent to the substitution for this resolution, that does not carry any teeth, a resolution such as he has been referring to, in order that the House may vote on it?

Mr. MACGREGOR. We are concerned with the proposition of the distribution of motor vehicles. It is not for me to consent to anything.

Mr. CALDWELL. I understand; but this is the point: The department has recommended the passage of a bill of this kind. We passed one, and then the House passed the sundry civil bill to prevent the distribution, and now you come in and ask that the Secretary of War do something in violation of law. Why not pass that one?

Mr. MACGREGOR. What is the question?

Mr. CALDWELL. Why not pass the Senate bill instead of this one?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman said that there were eighty-one thousand and some motor vehicles. How many passenger automobiles?

Mr. MACGREGOR. There are 81,000 automobiles and automobile trucks, 17,106 motor cycles, and 10,096 bicycles.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Of the 22,000 plus that you request the Secretary of War to turn over to the Agricultural Department, what kind of vehicles are those?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Do you mean that they asked to have turned over?

Mr. RAMSEYER. No; that you ask here in the resolution, some 22,000.

Mr. MACGREGOR. They were allocated to the Agricultural Department.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What were they? Passenger automobiles?

Mr. MACGREGOR. No; they were trucks mostly; some of them were passenger.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Why do they need passenger automobiles?

Mr. MACGREGOR. They claim that each State wants passenger machines for the use of its inspectors and engineers.

Mr. RAMSEYER. For State inspectors or Federal inspectors?

Mr. MACGREGOR. State inspectors.

Mr. HUSTED. I understood the gentleman to say that the Secretary of Agriculture had made requisition for some 22,000 of these machines.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. And of that number about 8,000 had already been delivered.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. That would leave about 14,000 undelivered.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. In view of that fact, why does the resolution ask for the immediate delivery of 22,000? Would not that be 8,000 more than the Secretary has asked for?

Mr. MADDEN. The States have not got the automobiles.

Mr. MACGREGOR. No. It reads, "For which requisition has heretofore been made by the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to ask the gentleman what he would think of the suggestion that these caterpillar motors be first offered to the farmers of the various States rather than these dealers, who would use them merely for profit and to sell again? It would assist agricultural production and help the farmer, and I believe the Government would get more money from the transaction. What does the gentleman think of it?

Mr. MacGREGOR. I am in favor of getting the most money for the benefit of the taxpayers.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman was on the subcommittee that brought in this resolution?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Why did you bring in a resolution affecting one body only, having no binding effect? Why did you not bring in a concurrent resolution?

Mr. MacGREGOR. To get action, the same as we did with respect to the Army food proposition, and we got action from the Secretary of War.

Mr. HUDSPETH. But the gentleman recognizes that this is only a request to do it?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Yes; certainly. Sometimes they do things on request, if the request comes strong enough.

Mr. LINTHICUM. He has the power to do it?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Oh, yes; the absolute power.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman know that the Secretary of War was just as rapidly turning over these motor vehicles as surplus was declared when, on July 1, the conference report on the sundry civil bill was passed here in the House, containing a provision that no motor vehicles hereafter should be turned over until specific authorization was given and after the passage of that law?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Not specifically authorized, but that it should be paid for.

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman will wait, I will read to him the law. I quoted it absolutely.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Besides that, that did not apply to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BLACK. The Judge Advocate General held that it did apply, and that unless the vehicles had been specifically authorized they should not be turned over; and it was upon the advice and opinion of the Judge Advocate General that the Secretary of War ceased the distribution. I think the gentleman would want to be fair enough to state that.

Mr. MacGREGOR. I understand there was no impediment in the way of going ahead and getting these into the hands of the Department of Agriculture. Anyway, there is August, September, and October.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Certainly.

Mr. VAILE. I understand from the gentleman's remarks that the Chief of Staff had declared a surplus of some 36,000 machines.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. And 22,200 of these are allotted to the Agriculture Department.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Twenty-two thousand one hundred and eighty-five.

Mr. VAILE. Now, the determination of what was surplus might vary from time to time, and would be subject to delay, would it not?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE] called attention to House bill 9412, which provides for the disposition of such machines as are or may hereafter be found to be surplus, to be distributed to the various departments.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. Now, under the resolution we are considering, House resolution 362, if they are all sold at public sale or auction there would be nothing for House bill 9412 to operate on, so that you would nullify that.

Mr. MacGREGOR. No; we would not nullify that; we would simply disagree with it.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. If I understand the situation correctly, it is something like this: The Secretary of War has partially complied with the proposed distribution of motor vehicles to the States, but now for some reason the distribution has been discontinued.

Mr. MacGREGOR. There has been some hesitation on account of the interpretation of the law.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Well, this resolution would not——

Mr. MacGREGOR. The law has been determined long ago—months ago.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. And still the Secretary of War does not function.

Mr. MacGREGOR. He does not function.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Certainly.

Mr. BEE. Why does this resolution provide that 22,200 trucks and motor vehicles shall go to the States and declare all over 22,200 to be surplus, to be sold at public sale to the public?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Because all that the Department of Agriculture has asked for is this number.

Mr. BEE. That would fill the bill, would it?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] wish to use any further time? If not, I yield 35 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for 35 minutes.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to occupy as little time as possible. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. ASWELL. War expenditures and investigations of this Congress.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Is that with reference to what the gentleman is going to speak on to-day?

Mr. ASWELL. Partly.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I do not object to the gentleman revising his remarks, but I object to his extending them unless some time is allowed to this side to answer them.

Mr. ASWELL. I shall not object to anyone answering.

Mr. KNUTSON. I want to ask the gentleman if his remarks are going to include anything in the line of the speech that he proposed to deliver the other day?

Mr. ASWELL. I am not discussing the election to-day, but some other things.

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, I think the gentleman had better proceed until we find out along what line he is proceeding. I object for the time being.

RETURN OF BODIES OF AMERICAN SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the appointment of the following Members on the part of the House of the joint committee to represent the Congress at the ceremonies at the port of New York in connection with the return of the bodies of dead American soldiers on the steamship Lake Daraga under House concurrent resolution 36: Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan, Mr. MASON, Mr. HULINGS, Mr. DOREMUS, Mr. CRISP, and Mr. SMITH of New York.

SURPLUS ARMY MOTOR VEHICLES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] will proceed.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is not my custom to follow a manuscript, but under the circumstances I desire now to speak with exactness and within a time limit.

Mr. Speaker, that the Democratic majority when in control was unafraid, worked incessantly, did things effectively, and reached definite ends, in striking contrast with the present Congress, no one denies. That some individual crookedness, mistakes, and errors did not occur in a task so urgent in time, so overwhelming in magnitude, so intricate in detail, as successfully prosecuting the war no one claims. That the Republican Party supported every measure centralizing executive authority in expending vast sums of money during the war all of us know. To note later developments should be interesting to the country, for the full meaning of the conduct of this Republican-controlled Congress has not yet been exposed to the American people.

The Republican leaders late in the last Congress began their political campaign by doing everything their limited vision would permit to nag and embarrass the President to prevent his going to Paris. They ended that session with the unpardonable filibuster, the details of which the country now knows and resents, to force the President to call a special session of the Congress. No Republican official protested at that time, and the Republican Party stands wholly responsible and rightly condemned before the country for that expensive and disgraceful filibuster. The President, of course, did what he always does—to the delight of the country and the humiliating chagrin of the Republicans. He ignored their garrulous chatter and petty partisan tactics, went on to Paris as duty called him, and gave the United States the foremost permanent place among the nations of the world. His bitterest enemies now secretly applaud his courageous conduct and fervently wish their party could find some way of escape from the wrath of the people which they know is certain to come.

Republican leaders, still eager to harass the President, then during two months howled incessantly for a special session of the Congress. They got it. They have had it for five months. They have done nothing, and they now cry to quit. Is it any wonder that the President foresaw this situation and appealed to the country for a Democratic Congress to support him in prosecuting the war and to hold the confidence of the country by enacting straightforward, efficient legislation during the reconstruction period through which we are now passing?

The first months of the Sixty-sixth Congress were largely taken up by repassing and increasing supply bills passed by this House in the last Congress, but, as is well known, for the purpose of embarrassing the President killed in another body by the now notorious Republican filibuster. Still eager to annoy the President, the Republican majority went into his private affairs on the question of gifts and found nothing to be criticized, for which the Republican Party, through the press, was properly rebuked by the American people. [Applause.]

The country is now in ominous turmoil, lawlessness seeks excuses, business is paralyzed and afraid, and internal agitators would like to threaten organized government. Yet the Republican majority, in full control of this Congress, sits supinely by without purposeful leadership. Until the last day of October, when forced by the crystallization of public sentiment, led by Democrats, they have refused to stand up and be counted on grave questions vital to the whole people. Attacking the administration and criticizing the Government have become the habit, which gives hope, comfort, and courage to anarchy and Bolshevism.

The attitude of Republican leaders on legislation in this House to-day would be amusing were it not tragic. This Congress has been in session for more than five months and nothing has been done to stay the hand of criminal greed, to quiet disorder, or to maintain and strengthen confidence in the Government. The Republican leaders have cold feet on their own proposed legislative program. Their extravagant promises have not been kept. Their loudly announced legislative program is practically untouched at this late day.

Exclusive of expenses for maintenance, heating, lighting, caring for the Capitol Grounds, and Printing Office expenses, the total appropriations carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, for the House, Senate, and Capitol police, were $7,175,657.75. This is not an opinion. It is the official record. Calculate it for yourself, and you find the expense to the people of Republican inaction is a minimum of $20,000 a day, or more than $3,000,000 already expended in the current expenses of this special session, to say nothing of vast additional expenditures through the protracted operations of the various investigating committees in this House and in another body of the Congress.

The Republican leaders in this House, although wholly responsible for the legislative program, hesitate, side-step, duck, dodge, and quibble among themselves. They know, as the country knows, that the Republicans of the West and the Republicans of the East can never agree on any permanent, serviceable, constructive legislation program. [Applause.] There is no hope as long as the Republican Party, with its discordant elements, is in control of the Government. [Applause.]

Afraid to move forward, they fiddle away the time by investigating everything that might give promise of campaign material for 1920, which is intended to divert public attention from their own shortcomings to the departments, nag the administration, and hinder efficiency. Let the Congress find out now how much time and money are being squandered upon these ponderous and noisy investigations to find campaign thunder for 1920, when up to this hour they have not revealed a single important fact not already known. The case of the Standard Steel Co. was revealed by the War Department itself.

The country wants legislation on the railroads, the merchant marine, the control and development of our national resources, our military and naval policies, the regulation of immigration, the stamping out of anarchy and Bolshevism, the high cost of living, the extension of motor-truck mail service, highway construction, and soldier-relief measures. [Applause.] The Democrats in Congress are eager for action. Yet the Republican majority refuses to act or permit action, fritters away the time with irrelevant political matters, to the discouragement and disgust of the country. Much noise was made by the Republicans as to the Lane land bill, now the Mondell bill, and yet that bill, over the protest of Democrats, serenely sleeps on the calendar, though prepared with great ostentation in the committee room, where Republican leaders had their pictures taken in dramatic action saving the soldiers. It is well known that the Republican leaders can secure action on a soldier's relief measure of some character any day they have the courage to tackle it. [Applause.] Nothing has been done for the returned soldiers except what has been worked out and accomplished by the departments of the Government in a Democratic administration, for which the Republicans can in no way claim credit. The Republicans, in absolute control, on the question of aiding the soldiers have shamefully reneged. Why do they remain inactive? Why are they afraid? The country has a right to know who is directly responsible for the disgraceful failure of this Congress to act on these measures. [Applause.] My eight resolutions calling for definite information from investigating committees, submitted October 20, if Republican leaders permit their passage, will reveal, in small part only, the amount of time wasted and money squandered by this House, to say nothing of similar waste in another body, on these political investigations declared to be purely political early in the session by the Republican chairman of the Committee on Rules. Answering questions, preparing data, and furnishing witnesses cost the departments vastly more in time and money than the investigating committees will report as expended.

Demobilization is being expensively delayed as Army officers are being held in the service to answer questions for the investigating committees. These august bodies have called upon the War Department to delay disposal of vast Government properties, especially in the States of Washington and West Virginia, involving several million dollars in each case, by ordering the War Department to hold up all bids for such disposal until investigating committees can investigate. Notice has been served upon the War Department not to do anything further until the committees can investigate. Three billion dollars of public business is tied up indefinitely. The country demands the disposal of motor trucks, automobiles, and other Army materials needed for road construction in civil life, yet the investigating committees are taking up the entire time of 40 per cent of the forces of the War Department in answering questions and preparing data for the investigating committees, leaving the department no time to meet the demands of the country or to transact the public business. Cantonment funds are tied up. Hundreds of worthy citizens who were ejected from their homes and their property used are still unpaid—all caused by delay in investigating cantonment expenditures, which makes it impossible for the claims already approved to be paid. Contracts with private citizens for building and construction are tied up by investigating committees and still unsettled. This is a crime against loyal citizens who are being robbed of their daily bread and who gladly gave their all to the use of the Government in the hour of need. [Applause.] How long must inefficiency be enthroned in this Congress?

Garrulous chatter, passion, partisanship, and prejudice on the treaty of peace and the league of nations continue a year after the signing of the armistice, at an expense of millions of dollars to the American people, by delaying the demobilization of the armed forces of the country. This same chatter and delay are contributing immeasurably to the encouragement of lawlessness and serious industrial unrest.

Except to pass one belated resolution, what has the Republican majority in control of Congress done to force respect for the law, to show its courage in this critical situation in support of the President and in opposition to class domination in subverting the Government in favor of the few, to stabilize business, to bring peace and contentment, or to merit the confidence of the people? [Applause.]

The Republican Party now knows with the successful inauguration of the income-tax law by the Democratic Party, which justly and properly taxes the great wealth of the country, that the antiquated and fossilized tariff system of their party is a dead issue. They do not dare come out in the open and try to revise the general Underwood tariff law upward, as they would like to do and as they promised they would do, but during these five months of Republican control, expensive to the country to the tune of $20,000 a day, not including the cost of numerous jaunting parties, and without submitting the measures openly to public scrutiny, as all legislative subjects should be submitted, especially tariff measures that vitally effect 110,000,000 people, they have from time to time quietly slipped in small bits of tariff legislation to give special privilege to a few favored big interests, which will enable the Republican Party to raise from these favored ones a large campaign fund in 1920. [Applause.] Let the country now know that even these piecemeal tariff measures already passed by this House, over the solid vote of the Democrats, when enacted into law will cost the consumers of the country $60,000,000 annually, with an additional forty millions already proposed and now intended to be slipped in by a Republican majority on potash alone, which means fertilizers for the farmers are to be taxed under Republican rule $40,000,000 annually. Will the country tolerate such special privilege? If the Republican Party assesses these special interests 5 per cent of this graft, which these interests will, of course, gladly pay, the Republican Party will have in 1920 from this source alone a campaign fund of $5,000,000. Can the next national election be thus purchased?

In honor we entered the war; with honor we ended it, and honorably should we deal with those who faithfully bore the responsibility of prosecuting it. No Democrat or department of the Government opposes the most searching investigation in quest of facts for the good of the Government, but we demand that the country's present and future business also receive the serious attention of the Congress. [Applause.] If there be crookedness or dishonesty in any expenditure of public funds in any department of the Government, apprehend and punish the guilty without mercy, whether he be big or little, Democrat or Republican, but do not fiddle along for a year for campaign purposes, as you clearly plan to do. [Applause.] Do not tie up the activities of the departments indefinitely at an expense to the country of millions of dollars. Do the job well and on time, so this Congress may get to business, the departments may proceed to function, and the country have a rest. [Applause.] But it is not your purpose to do the job either well or on time. You are not searching for information that is reliable, accurate, or dependable. What could a jaunting party of two or three joy riding in Europe for one month ascertain as to the exact expenditures of hundreds of millions of dollars in France? What can a handful of accountants in Washington ascertain as to the expenditures of billions of dollars?

It is estimated by the War Department that 115,257 people were actively engaged during a period of 18 months in making these expenditures scattered throughout the world. Any competent accountant will certify that to make an accurate investigation of these expenditures would take a force of several hundred accountants working over a period of from 5 to 10 years. How many men have you now at work? Have you more than a few dozen in addition to your jaunting parties? Your claim of searching for the exact truth is ridiculous. Your committees have blazed a shameful political trail from the Capital of the Nation across the country to the Pacific coast. [Applause.] You are trying to keep the country in turmoil to cover up your inaction and inefficiency. You do not want a complete and accurate investigation. You prefer a few snipers to pluck here and there for material for campaign purposes. Your noisy investigations are misleading no one to believe that the results will be of value to the country.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. No; I can not yield.

Republican leaders devote their energies to making much ado about the enormous cost of the war, for which they voted on every roll call. They call it extravagance by the Democratic administration. But, Mr. Speaker, war itself is nothing but extravagance. War means waste of money; it means destruction of life and property. The greatest waste of war is that of blood and men. The facts are, regardless of the cost in money, the American people demanded that the Democratic administration organize the manhood of the country and win the war. It was not a question of penny-wise economy. The people rightly demanded that the war be won. The task was assigned to the Democratic administration. The job was done well, on time, and to the entire satisfaction of the American people and the allied peoples of the world. [Applause.] The only question was to win the war and win it on time. What Republican now dares intimate that the task was not accomplished to the satisfaction and delight of the American people? Now is the time to retrench, to economize, and to prevent extravagance; but it was not the time during the war for niggardly economy of money when it meant the sacrifice of men. Time then was not only money but it was life. Delay meant death to thousands of American men; it meant to prolong the struggle.

Reduce the cost of the war by subtracting every penny claimed useless or extravagant, and the total sum will not be the value of one American soldier saved from death. [Applause.] How many American lives would Republican critics have sacrificed in order for the Government not to have been liberal in the expenditures of money? Let them answer to the mothers of the country! [Applause.]

The attitude of the people during the war on this question of money as contrasted with saving the lives of our soldiers was clearly revealed by the lavish hand with which the American people contributed to every cause for the support and comfort of the American soldier. Had it seemed necessary any real American would have contributed his last dollar to relieve the needs of one American soldier in France.

Instead of wasting so much time and money now in talking endlessly of the cost of the war, it were better to stop foolish expenditures, retrench in appropriations, and save money by purposeful energy and efficiency in this Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ASWELL. I can not yield.

The marvelous achievements of the American people in boldly defying the murderous German mines and submarines to send troops in overwhelming numbers and supplies in abundance to France in defense of our country and the liberty of man amazed the world and staggered the enemy. The rapidity and magnitude of the construction of American docks, railroads, supply stations, means of equipment, lines of communication and transportation in France was a subject of admiration and wonder to the Allies and discouragement to the enemy. If there be doubt on this point I call Gen. Ludendorff of the German Army as a witness, whose recent articles are convincing.

Let Republican critics condemn and investigate as they will but this record of brilliant American Democratic achievement in winning the war was never equaled and can never be surpassed in the history of the world. [Applause.]

With the American people the war is ended, and we face the future. The people are disgusted with endless chatter in criticism of expenditures in a war so nobly and effectively won. The American soldiers themselves are utterly tired of Republican wrangling over the money expended in that struggle. None of it can be salvaged or reclaimed now by wasting millions in political vituperation in the vain hope of party advantage in 1920. [Applause.] The people have turned their faces to the front with manly courage and are ready for mighty strides in progress and efficiency, if the proper readjustment and reconstruction of industrial and commercial enterprises can be speedily accomplished. The duty, the opportunity, of this Congress is to quiet conflicting interests and lead in the reestablishment of confidence and faith among men. Why can not the Republican majority keep pace with the demands of the hour? The country demands whole-hearted, concrete action by this Congress—sane, purposeful, constructive legislation. Dark is the future of that party unable to grasp or recognize the American spirit in this moment of opportunity, which failure reveals that party's incapacity for constructive leadership.

The Republican Party in this Congress has been "weighed in the balance and found wanting." Its leaders should stop playing petty politics, cease dillydallying, get down to business, do something worth while for the whole people, or surrender control and quit! [Applause.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I feel certain that some gentleman on the other side will desire to answer the speech of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], and therefore I yield for that purpose.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, there will be but one more speech on this side, and I will ask the gentleman to use his time.

Mr. DONOVAN. That is our plan here.

Mr. REAVIS. I think under the rule the proponents of the resolution have the privilege of closing the debate.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I will proceed, if it is the desire of the gentleman from Nebraska.

First, let me ask that I be not interrupted, for the reason that in my treatment of this subject I shall endeavor to talk on the facts as I understand them, ignoring absolutely the question whether it is a Democratic or a Republican administration that has control of it. It is my conception that the House and the country want to know the facts untinctured, uncolored, and I think I can in an impartial way submit them, and by them answer and rebut suspicions and statements that have been carelessly and recklessly made, which I have heard repeated even by several substantial Members of this House.

Gentlemen, you know that it is the easiest thing in the world to start a damaging rumor, whether it is as to a man's character, his business ability, or whatever it may be. There is always some one ready to take it up and magnify it and then pass it on.

I am at a disadvantage in not being apprised what the proponent of this resolution contends, for he has assumed the rather unusual practice of refusing to present either his facts or criticisms, and my presentations must perforce therefore be in an assumption of what I believe will be said by him.

So probably you will be told that the administration of the War Department has been grossly negligent in the functions of its office, particularly relative to the automobile situation, as to the declaration and disposal of the surplus. You will be told, with more power and eloquence than I can command, that a frightful condition exists. Sometimes I wonder if we do not let personal vanity get the better of our judgment when given the opportunity to come on the floor and draw the attention of the country to either our histrionic powers or our oratorical ability, and if through that same element of vanity we do not frequently confuse the issue in a maze of meaningless, partisan, or unjust criticism of the absolute true fact. No doubt you will be told in fine rhetoric of the terrible condition that exists relating to the motor vehicles now under the control of the Secretary of War. You will be told that over here at Camp Holabird, a suburb of Baltimore, there are 11,000 autos, and you will probably be given the impression that all of them are passenger cars, which is not the fact, and that there are among them a number of new cars that have never been used, that a part of them are crated, but that they are crated in such a way that they are not protected. You will also be told that there are trucks standing over there in the open without bodies upon them; that the transmissions are being affected by the weather. You will be told, further, that by the neglect in declaring a surplus nothing has been done, or you will be told that a surplus was declared by one department and then that the director of sales absolutely fell down and has not done his duty. You will be told that Gen. Drake, who was in charge of the Motor Transport Corps, did his part, and that it was a question of whipsawing between the several bureaus.

Now, what are the facts? I am not going into a minute detail of figures and amounts. I am not a mathematician; neither am I an expert accountant. I know you want the truth. I think I know facts when I see them and they impress me.

Knowing them and having given them a careful consideration and examination, I can with confidence assure you that we as a Government need no alibi or speak aught but the truth, which, in my opinion, proves conclusively, with the exception of delay in declaring a correct surplus by the Chief of the Motor Transport Corps, which has also a justifiable side, that any vehement criticism by the gentlemen who are to follow me or from any other source is most unfair.

Now, what was the situation? Let me try to help you visualize the facts, if I can, by giving you the details of this subject. You may well ask who has charge of the motor vehicles in the War Department. It is the Assistant Secretary of War, Benedict Crowell. When the war started we had in this country about 5,000 motor vehicles in the Army. Motorizing the Army was a new problem upon which we were launching. We, of course, had no equipment and had no adequate facilities for storage, for what we then had were motor cycles, bicycles, and trucks, and the small total of these were distributed throughout the entire country. There were very few passenger cars.

When the armistice was declared, or immediately thereafter, the Acting Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell, called in conference a representative of the Motor Transport Corps, a representative of the Purchase and Supply Department in the Quartermaster Corps, and a representative of the General Staff and gave instructions that "a surplus must be declared." It was decided at this conference to determine what would be a correct surplus, that the first necessary step to be determined was to know how many men were to be included under the proposed peace plan of the Army.

At that time it was the purpose, the hope, and desire of the War Department that there should be an Army of 500,000 men. The conferees assuming that number to be the basis upon which to begin, the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell, then ordered that a surplus of 30,000 vehicles be declared. Do not be deceived that this meant 30,000 passenger cars, as has been erroneously stated in the public press of the country. This surplus included bicycles, motor cycles, trailers, trucks, passenger cars, observation cars, and cars upon which were mounted small ordnance.

Then the question was discussed what types of cars should be declared surplus. It was decided that certain cars and trucks which had proven the most serviceable and practicable for Army use were to be retained, which resulted in what they, the confrères, called standardizing the motor vehicles then within the control of the War Department. They classified the Cadillac as the largest passenger car, the Dodge as the smaller passenger car, and the White as the observation staff car. They classified the Packard truck, the Garford truck, the T. T truck, the ammunition train truck, and kitchen truck, and also certain trailers, and ordered a survey made by the Motor Transport Corps of these trucks and cars, which they designated as standard, and other cars and trucks designated as nonstandard be thereupon surveyed and declared surplus, and that the nonstandard surplus be held ready for transfer to the several governmental departments that under the law were entitled to them.

Immediately Gen. Goethals, then Assistant Chief of Staff, Director of Purchase, Storage and Traffic, on February 27, 1919, issued Supply Circular No. 16 to the office of the director of sales, which read:

Supply circular No. 16.

WASHINGTON, February 27, 1919.

Subject: Office of the Director of Sales.

Confirming verbal instructions of December 17, 1918, there is established in the Purchase, Storage and Traffic Division a sales branch under an officer designated as the director of sales, whose duties will be as follows:

(a) To formulate, supervise, coordinate, and direct the selling of surplus supplies, material, equipment, by-products thereof, buildings, plants, factories, or lands embraced within the act of Congress approved July 9, 1918.

(b) To supervise and direct the sale, in accordance with existing regulations and statutes, of all other supplies, material, and property not embraced within the act of Congress approved July 9, 1918, but the sale of which may be desired in the public interest, as may be directed from time to time by the Director of Purchase, Storage and Traffic.

(c) To direct and supervise the compilation of records covering all sales of any war supplies, material, lands, factories, or buildings and equipment, so that a detailed report may be made to Congress on the first day of each regular session, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 9, 1918.

By authority of the Secretary of War:

GEO. W. GOETHALS,
Major General, Assistant Chief of Staff,
Director of Purchase, Storage and Traffic.

In accordance with this letter the Director of Sales relayed it to the Chief of the Motor Transport Corps, and advised that a surplus be immediately declared of all serviceable trucks and cars of the nonstandard type. The Post Office Department, the Agricultural Department, the Public Health Service, had been sending to the office of the director of sales numberless requisitions for cars of the serviceable nonstandard type.

What was the result? The director of sales' office patiently awaited the receipt of the requested declaration of surplus from the Motor Transport Corps, and on March 27, 1919, received memorandum, which reads as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, March 27, 1919.

Memorandum for the Director of Sales:

In compliance with the request from Col. Fred Glover, through Maj. Guy Hutchinson, that a list be immediately submitted showing the amount of excess transportation on hand under the Secretary of War's allowance to be retained, I submit herewith a tentative list, unapproved and subject to revision, of vehicles now available for sale:

Automobiles:
Miscellaneous American makes, all used; approximately, 30 per cent unserviceable	968
Fords, new and serviceable, approximately	1,200
Total automobiles available for disposition	2,168
Light delivery and light repair trucks; all used but in serviceable condition	2,212
Motor patrol wagons	97
Class "AA": Staff observation and reconnoissance cars	1,000
The above are all new vehicles.
Class "A":
Garfords, practically 50 per cent used	1,200
Light aviation, approximately 50 per cent used	2,000
Pierce-Arrow, all new	900
Miscellaneous American makes; all used	2,200
Type "B":
Miscellaneous American makes, all used	2,166
Pierce-Arrow, new	919
Riker, practically 50 per cent used	800
Macks, practically 50 per cent used	1,932
Packards, practically 30 per cent used	2,500
Heavy aviation, practically 20 per cent used	2,500
F. W. D.:
Nash, not more than 5 per cent used	7,750
F. W. D., practically 20 per cent used	4,000
Total trucks, all classes, available for disposition	33,067

A. OWEN SEAMAN,
Colonel, General Staff.

P. S.—The above list should not be taken into consideration under any circumstances until the Army has been reduced to a working basis of 500,000 men.

Which purported to be the surplus, ordered declared by Assistant Secretary of War Crowell, and which stated it was "a tentative list, unapproved and subject to revision, of vehicles now available for sale," and under a postscript stated "the above list should not be taken into consideration under any circumstances until the Army has been reduced to a working basis of 500,000 men."

On April 15, 1919, Gen. March, Chief of Staff, declared a surplus predicated on the information given him by the Motor Transport Corps under date of March 27, 1919, which was most incomplete as to the condition, the location, and data of any consequence to assist the director of sales in giving a complete description to possible purchasers either by the Government or by the public. The number requisitioned by the Agriculture Department alone was 22,000. In the meantime the director of sales' office was phoning and writing the Motor Transport Corps for an accurate surplus of the available nonstandard serviceable cars and trucks for disposal.

The director of sales, being unable to obtain from it an accurate list, in sheer desperation, knowing that the Agriculture Department particularly and the Post Office Department needed the cars which they requisitioned, ordered the entire number declared surplus to be transferred and gave the order as regulations directed to the Motor Transport Corps for the physical delivery of these cars and trucks. When about 8,000 vehicles were transferred to the Agriculture Department, there were transferred in all about 19,000 vehicles of the 36,000 declared. Then there was a cessation of further transfers, because there came a conflict as to the interpretation or meaning of the legislation passed by the Congress as to whether these cars could be transferred without transfer of funds. The War Department, through the Judge Advocate General, gave an interpretation that the nonserviceable vehicles transferred to the Agriculture and Post Office Departments could not be allotted and transferred without a transfer of funds, while it had been the custom of the War Department up to that time to transfer them without a transfer of funds.

The Agricultural Department did not concur in that opinion or interpretation of the Judge Advocate General of the War Department and relied upon the opinion of its own solicitor, which was contrary to that of the Judge Advocate General. There were a number of cars and trucks in transit which had been shipped. They were on the trains or they were being propelled under their own power, and were then a distance from the several storage camps from which they had started. Under these circumstances the Secretary of War, instead of ordering them to return or be taken off the cars and paying the additional freight for their return, displayed the best of business judgment and common sense and sent them through to their destination to the several State departments of agriculture. When that opinion was rendered by the Judge Advocate General the hands of the War Department were tied, and it stopped all succeeding cleared orders for transfer and delivered no more of the vehicles, because there was the interpretation of the two lawyers diametrically opposed. The result of this complication of legal construction was that the Agricultural Department requested an opinion of the Attorney General, and that request was made on August 13 last.

The opinion of the Attorney General was rendered in September following. It disagreed and reversed the interpretation of the law as promulgated and enunciated by the Judge Advocate General of the War Department, and thereupon the War Department started right in again to distribute vehicles in accordance with orders and allotments made by the director of sales' office.

But I want to be fair and I want to be honest. I forgot or overlooked this point. Here was the system by which the allocation of these cars was made: There was a trinity of function. First, Assistant Secretary of War Crowell, who was chief executive in this particular line of activity. Then there was the director of sales in Purchase, Storage and Traffic, and there was also the Motor Transport Corps.

Now, gentlemen, the sales department was created by Gen. Goethals, and I need not tell you that he has the confidence of the American people, irrespective of political faith. What was the purpose for its organization? The purpose was that, as you all know, in years past, during war and also during peace times, it was the practice of some weak Army officers, who could not withstand temptation, to yield to the graft system, and many an Army scandal resulted, and frequently dishonest Army officers were convicted and served time in the penitentiaries. The system to defraud was as follows: Some Army officer would make a survey and declare certain vehicles or equipment as unusable and drop them from the Army property list and order a sale; then he would have an outside man through whom he could work, and the Army officer would share in the illegal profit. That is common knowledge and is nothing new. Gen. Goethals—not only wonderful in his military career and character but a man of wonderful commercial and business instincts—conceived the idea of creating the department of sales and placing at its head a trained business man from civil life, whose private as well as business character was unimpeachable. He selected as its first director Mr. Hare.

I do not know him, but his reputation is of the highest type. The present acting director of sales, Col. Guy Hutchinson, is a man of equal high character, probity, and ability, and one of the finest type of men in this country. Col. Hutchinson, now in control, volunteered for service in the World War and was recruited for overseas duty, later commissioned a major, and then promoted to a lieutenant colonel. When Mr. Hare resigned he was designated from the commissioned force of the Army as acting director of sales, which position he has creditably held for about four months.

The director of sales was constantly urging the Motor Transport Corps for a corrected and accurate surplus, stating where the vehicles were and what was their condition, and, not receiving it, he finally, as I have before stated, despairing of ever getting an accurate one, began to allot the total of cars and trucks as reported in the alleged declared surplus of April, 1919, and did, in fact, make an allotment of the entire list available to the Post Office and Agriculture Departments, and gave orders to the Motor Transport Corps to transfer them accordingly. This allotting of surplus vehicles was completed by June 6, 1919.

You will be told that on April 15, 1919, there was a surplus declared of 36,000 vehicles—not all cars—including bicycles, motor cycles, trailers, trucks, and automobiles, and that this department of sales had at that time the information whereby it could have allocated or transferred them. What is there in regard to that? If I were to make a criticism, I would say that I believe if there is any fault to be found, there was an element of lack of speed, lack of pep, lack of business efficiency in the Motor Transport Corps in not declaring an accurate and complete surplus. To be sure, the Chief of Staff, Gen. March, on April 15, 1919, taking what had been sent to him by the chief of the Motor Transport Corps, reiterated it in a memorandum, declaring what I believe was but an alleged surplus. What was it?

It said that 1,516 light delivery trucks, 2,071 light aviation 2-ton, 3,166 American miscellaneous 3-ton, with others, constituted a surplus; nothing in this alleged surplus of April 15, 1919, to show where they were, nothing to show what was their condition, nothing to show whether they were serviceable or not, and the sales department could not on that data submit the unserviceable nonstandard trucks or cars declared surplus to the departments for transfer, because it was to be a business transaction, and the Post Office Department as well as the Agriculture Department wanted to send their respective representatives to inspect them before receipting for them. Not knowing where they were necessarily caused delay in their inspection and delivery, and not being informed the type of vehicle, the make of it, what its condition was, whether it was standard or nonstandard, serviceable or unserviceable, the whole proceeding of distribution and disposal of surplus was impeded. So the department of sales wrote back to the Motor Transport Corps and asked for a particularization in regard to these cars. You will be told that there were about 670 communications that Gen. Drake testified he had sent to the sales director, and after a number of months they were returned to him with a letter from the director of sales.

It is true that Gen. Drake's department, the Motor Transport Corps, wrote hundreds of letters to the sales department, covering a great many months; it is not true that they were returned with the statement that they were not wanted, but with instructions and a form for the Motor Transport Corps to execute and give the much-sought-for information.

Now, of what did these letters consist? The first one that came was somewhere along in March or April, and it was a letter stating that there was one Ford car for sale in the West. Another day another came stating that there was one for sale in Chicago, or two or three. It was a crazy quilt, a patchwork, piecemeal affair, from which the sales department could make nothing for the advantage of a proper sale, and so the director of sales wrote back—and it is all in the hearings with the copies of the letters asking for specific information, and in March, when a supposed declaration was made and sent by Maj. Williams, of the Motor Transport Corps—in that communication there was a reservation that said, "Do not consider this as final, because it is subject to revision; we can not tell as to the number of the Army." They never had a properly declared surplus, and it is an actual fact that the Motor Transport Corps and its chief testified before our subcommittee that they are to-day engaged in a survey of cars, admitting that a real accurate surplus was never declared, and, therefore, that these motor vehicles could not be properly allotted, and they are now endeavoring to do so. The department of sales, after its temper had been exhausted, last August assigned the entire distribution of this surplus of nonstandard vehicles to the management of the Motor Transport Corps, who are now struggling with it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. In view of the fact that England and France have been able to sell all of the cars which they had which they did not need after the close of the war, I wonder why it is that we have not been able to find out even how many we have.

Mr. DONOVAN. Because the personnel of the Army has not been established.

Mr. MADDEN. That was not necessary.

Mr. DONOVAN. At that time it was necessary.

Mr. MADDEN. Somebody ought to know how many cars we had.

Mr. DONOVAN. That was one of the elements—that the personnel of the Army had not been decided. The next reason was the misfortune of not declaring a proper surplus. On June 6 every one of these cars was allotted to the several departments, and then came in the legal interpretation, which delayed it. It will be said that there are, as described in the press, acres of cars over in Holabird not under cover and deteriorating. It may be true that they are not all under cover, but it is not true that they are rapidly deteriorating, as has been alleged. I went to Camp Holabird with my colleagues. I was told that there was a number of cars over there—trucks, with their transmissions exposed—and that they could not be moved under their own power. To me that was a shocking declaration. I gladly went, and we went through there, and sure enough there was a number of trucks, a great number of them—I think at the maximum there have been 8,000 trucks there at different times since the signing of the armistice—but what did we find. We found those trucks there in perfect alignment, just as if they were men. We found the hoods in good shape. They were on the trucks all in good shape. The curtains were down and they were protected as much as they could be. In a number of instances the bodies were off the chassis. We looked at the transmission. Did we find any uncovered? No. I did not see one; and I think my colleagues will agree that they did not. I did not see one uncovered. And where the paint was chipped off the body of the car, it was gone over with the necessary compound, and this was done once a month, and a corps of 30 men was employed for this line of duty alone.

But let me get back to the statement or rumor that the transmissions on the trucks at Holabird were exposed to the weather. What happens to the transmission of a truck or auto in action. Is it coddled? Is it protected from the elements? No. What do they do with cars and trucks to-day in everyday use? They not only run them in wet weather but through shush and mud, and every time the wheel turns and revolves it deposits the mud and slush up against the transmission, which at worst, as to the trucks at Camp Holabird, which have not the bodies on them, could only be injured from above by a downpour of rain, which is rather infrequent. The chairman asked Maj. Evans, the motor expert, why the bodies were not on the trucks, and was told that all of them were crated and under cover. The line of examination led to the reason why it would not be better to have them on the trucks than in storage, and Maj. Evans very quickly pointed out that whatever complaint the chairman might have of the cars as they now were, without the bodies, the bodies, if upon chassis, would, of course, be subject to the elements, and were better off crated and in covered storage.

The chairman put the following question to Maj. Evans:

Now, Major, I ask you, is it not a fact that these cars standing there for eight months in the open, subject to the winds of winter and the rains of summer, will deteriorate?

Maj. Evans replied:

Slightly.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by that?

Maj. EVANS. A day like to-day it would not deteriorate at all—

It was a sunshiny day, the 6th of September—because it would only deteriorate when there is moisture in the air.

And he said:

It is not so material as you would suppose, because a truck or car is run from 14 to 16 hours.

You will be told about the cars in park G. I designated it the hospital junk heap and isolation ward. There are 500 nonstandard passenger cars in park G. Maj. Evans testified that they were received in the same condition that the committee observed they were in when it visited the camp on August last. They were the junk that was declared unserviceable and absolute derelicts, and sent to Holabird to the junk heap, and dropped from the property list of the Army, from the camps and cantonments from which they came. They consist of every type of nonstandard passenger cars, and trucks which were discarded. They are unserviceable. The chairman of our subcommittee asked Maj. Evans:

What do you mean by unserviceable?

Maj. Evans replied:

Unserviceable means a car that can not go on the road under its own power.

Gentlemen, even after these unserviceable derelicts from all over the country have stood out in the open in this isolation ward for a number of months and dropped from the property lists of the Army, it is a high indorsement of the management of the War Department when I tell you that one hundred-odd of these cars were dismantled and their parts taken by the Post Office Department to replenish other cars, and that the War Department has sold 80 of these derelicts and has received a sum of about $5,000 for them.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. DONOVAN. For a question.

Mr. HUSTED. Could not some of those cars which were declared unserviceable have been repaired and made serviceable, and would it not have been a desirable thing to do?

Mr. DONOVAN. Maj. Evans answered that question, and I thank the gentleman for bringing it out. The policy of the War Department was to repair all serviceable vehicles of the standard type. They, of course, were to be retained by the War Department. These cars, of course, were used roughly during the war, and there was a vast number of them that needed repairing. The cars in Park G—Maj. Evans or Col. Chitty, I do not recall which one it was—or it might have been Capt. Crane—testified that they were beyond repair. Those that were disposed of, as I have already stated, to the Post Office Department and sold to an individual for the $5,000 were taken to be dismantled and have their parts used for replacements.

Much will be made, I expect, by the gentlemen following me of the fact that there are a number of new cars at Holabird that are crated, and it will be claimed, I fear, that, to quote the pet question of the chairman of the subcommittee, "that the beating of the winds of winter and the rains of summer against them" causes their deterioration. You need give no serious concern to such a contention if it is advocated. There are, I think, some two hundred and odd Dodge cars, new ones, that are crated. They were sent to Holabird for transshipment when the armistice was declared, and they are neatly and orderly piled five high and six wide and are under an A-shaped sectional roof, whose edges extend beyond the front, back, and sides of the walls of the crates which go to make the substructure of the building. The roof is covered with heavy water-proof tar paper, mechanically laid. The crates are made of seven-eighths tongued and grooved white pine lumber, and you who know what white pine is know that it is the best rain and sun resisting lumber in the world. The cars in these white pine crates are slushed with oil and a grease compound, are wrapped in a two-ply water-proof tar paper, and the crates by their construction, being tongued and grooved and closely jointed, are light, air, and storm proof.

The Motor Transport Corps, upon taking out several of these cars from the crates, found them in the same condition that you or I would find a new car which we might buy directly from the factory, which would be shipped to us in the exact type of crate and would be hauled by the railroad on a flat car subject to greater exposure during its transit, but of course not probably of so long a duration.

These cars were found to be in the pink of condition, both mechanically and as to their painting and upholstery.

Gentlemen, I want you to remember that of the 11,000 vehicles at Camp Holabird less than one-third of them are in the open. A great majority of them are the trucks which I have described. Every bicycle, every motor cycle, and 727 ambulances, besides thousands of trucks and passenger cars, are under cover. I think the following question and answer—the answer being that of an expert—explains much as to any damage that might result to the exposed trucks or cars:

Mr. REAVIS. Do you want to be understood in this record, as a practical automobile man, as saying that motor cars standing exposed that way would not deteriorate and were not deteriorating?

Maj. EVANS. There is an element there that I do not think has come to the minds of the people who were looking into that. The vehicle that is in operation on the road is usually in operation from 14 to 16 hours a day. It is then out exposed to the elements. The vehicle in our parks is exposed only 24 hours, so that there is only a slight time that the vehicle standing in our parks is receiving any greater exposure to the weather than the vehicle that is in operation.

Gentlemen, I think I have now arrived at a point in this discussion where a vital consideration and a just criticism might be leveled at the Motor Transport Corps or the War Department for not providing sufficient storage to house all of these many motor vehicles that were in the open subject to the weather not alone at Camp Holabird but at Camp Normoyle and Camp Jeffries, which were the three big receiving and shipping storage motor vehicle depots in America. I was about to ask Gen. Drake, the chief of the Motor Transport Corps, this question, but was relieved of that duty when the chairman of the subcommittee propounded the following in reference thereto:

Mr. REAVIS. Have you ever made an effort to store any of these cars?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir. We have tried to get storage. In fact, we have an appropriation, an allotment of $375 for building storage in these different camps, Camp Holabird, Camp Normoyle, and Camp Jeffries, and we had just started work with all the materials on the ground when Congress passed an act prohibiting the further use of funds for construction camps, cantonments, etc. We contended to the War Department that our activities at these places did not come within the intent of this act, but the decision was made adversely to us, so that the construction could not be proceeded with.

Gentlemen, here is a complete answer to the question, and it is given by Gen. Drake, and I believe every fair man of this Congress will subscribe to this fact that here at least is a most substantial reason why vehicles were not placed under cover, and do not forget, gentlemen, that Maj. Evans testified that these motor vehicles, with the exception of the junk heap, were being received and shipments made ever since the armistice to date, and that, in his opinion, none of the trucks or cars that were in the open had remained at Holabird for one time longer than three months, and many of them not as long as one month. I confess that I am at a disadvantage to answer in detail criticisms that may be advanced by the gentlemen who will follow me as to the handling, management, and disposition of the surplus motor vehicles, from the fact that the chairman of the subcommittee, who I am reliably informed is the creator of the resolution under discussion, has adopted the rather unusual procedure, as the proponent of the resolution, to withhold his support of it until the close of the time-period allotment under the special rule.

To me the resolution is one of absolute senseless purport because, speaking in the kindliest manner of it, it is only a suggestion or an attempt to accomplish what is already being done by the War Department, and it has the other regrettable effect of superseding or suspending the consideration of a most important bill and sidetracking it for an entire day—the banking bill, or what is known as the Edge bill. I shall, however, notwithstanding the senseless feature of the resolution, for the reasons that I have just disclosed, vote for it, because it is but a reiteration of the policy now employed by the War Department in disposing of the unserviceable nonstandard surplus vehicles, and it is also an indorsement of the excellent business management employed under the direction of Col. Hutchinson, director of sales of the Purchase, Storage and Traffic Division of the War Department.

I expect you will be further told that a vast number of cars have been purchased from the factories since the signing of the armistice and have been received at Camp Holabird. I doubt, in view of a careful reading of the testimony, whether anyone following me will have the temerity to make such a statement. The fact is that many new cars were received at Holabird; the further fact is that not a new car was purchased from the factories. The program of purchase by the Division of Purchase, Storage and Traffic of the War Department contracted for a great number of cars on a monthly production basis to extend over and to include, as you will recall, the month of June, 1919, for it was then that we thought back in the months of August and September, 1918, that the war would be ended. When the armistice was signed on November 11, 1918, these commitments for the production of motor vehicles were going ahead with great rapidity, and there was delivered each week from the factories in this country to the War Department 1,100 passenger cars. When the armistice was signed many of these cars and trucks were unassembled and were being assembled; many were in storage in the factories about to be shipped, and the result was that a large cancellation of thousands and thousands of cars and trucks was made by the War Department, but those that were finished or about to be finished were permitted to be shipped by direction of the War Department's representatives at the factories, and they were strung out over a period of two or more months after the signing of the armistice with the object of saving costs of storage or the necessity of placing these new crated cars out in the open, such as I assume complaint will be made, by the gentlemen who will follow me, of those that were so stored at Holabird. As an evidence of the small proportion of new cars that was received after the signing of the armistice, the director of sales canceled all orders on passenger cars and received during the succeeding months from November to June but the equal of one week's production—1,100 cars—in all that period. What was true of the passenger cars was proportionately true of the trucks.

I desire at this time to read a letter from Col. Hutchinson, assistant director of sales, under date of October 16, 1919, to Hon. Benedict Crowell, Assistant Secretary of State, from which you will gather a very clear and intelligible understanding relative to this phase of the motor-vehicle situation:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PURCHASE, STORAGE AND TRAFFIC DIVISION,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF SALES.
Washington, October 16, 1919.

Memorandum for the Assistant Secretary of War.

1. Complying with your verbal request this morning concerning cancellation of motor-vehicle contracts, the following is submitted on trucks (all types, including ambulances) and passenger cars:

2. Immediately upon the signing of the armistice manufacturers were consulted in the matter of cancellation of their contracts, the War Department production representatives at the different district offices were called into conference as to the status of production on various contracts, and in every case the War Industries Board was consulted and its approval secured. The result is given herewith:

Total vehicles ordered to Nov. 10, 1918:
Trucks	198,768
Passenger cars	37,065
Undelivered as of November 10:
Trucks	119,625
Passenger cars	20,690
Average production per month for November, December, and January:
Trucks	17,020
Passenger cars	4,931
Canceled since Nov. 11, 1918:
Trucks	78,340
Passenger cars	19,672
Accepted by War Department Nov. 11, 1918, to date:
Trucks	41,285
Passenger cars	1,018

3. In making cancellations it was assumed that the Army needed no further motor vehicles. Efforts were therefore made to cancel as many vehicles as possible, taking into consideration, of course, the status of production and the amount of material which the Government would have to pay for in settling claims resulting from such cancellations. It will be noted that approximately only one week's production in passenger cars after the signing of the armistice was accepted, and that on trucks of all types there was accepted only the average production for two and one-half months. It will be seen that manufacturers were allowed approximately a 60-day run in order to finish machine work on parts in process and to complete assembling. An average termination of 70 per cent of all contracts was effected.

4. Considering that the War Department had practically reached the "peak" of production when the armistice was signed, terminations to this extent were remarkable. If additional terminations of any consequence had been made, it would not only have worked an extreme hardship on the manufacturers and labor, but would have cost the Government practically as much to have adjusted claims, and instead of having completed vehicles the War Department would have had a lot of uncompleted material worth only scrap value.

5. The requirements for any Army of 30 divisions, shown on tentative table of vehicle requirements, as filed by the Motor Transport Corps as of August 31, 1918, and on which basis the War Department was purchasing motor equipment shows that there were required for each army approximately: 7,800 touring cars, 6,200 ambulances, 55,350 trucks, 24,000 motor cycles, 17,000 bicycles, 8,000 trailers.

6. After the cancellations were arranged for, the manufacturers were allowed to extend their final delivery dates on the vehicles still due, for the reason that the Government storage facilities were totally inadequate, and for the further reason that these extensions on deliveries would allow the manufacturer to more readily resume his commercial business, meanwhile holding the nucleus of his organization together while finishing up the Government contracts.

7. This subject is an intricate one, and it is impossible to give all the details in a brief memorandum, but the above covers the subject in a general way. As many of the vehicles under contract were not of a commercial character, it was necessary to allow production over a more extended period on these machines than on vehicles of a strictly commercial type.

By authority of the Director of Sales:

GUY HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Director of Sales.

Gentlemen, I believe that I am almost prophetic when I tell you that I am about to assume that a dramatic and perhaps a tragic effect will be reached when you are told by one of the gentlemen that is to follow me in discussing this subject that since the armistice was signed shipment of vehicles were continued to be made overseas for the use of the American Army. When it first came to my attention that such a procedure had been employed I confess that I was very much in the same mental attitude in which I assume you will be when you will be told with great power of declamation that a number of motor vehicles were shipped overseas since November 11, 1918. I was amazed and appalled to the same degree that one of my colleagues on the subcommittee stated in the framing of a question on this subject in one of the hearings was until I received the knowledge and heard the War Department's explanation. I trust, however, that the gentlemen who are to follow me in addressing themselves to the resolution will not be hypocritical or unfair, but will honestly confess and admit, as I do, my complete confidence in the necessity for the shipments and in indorsement of the policy after I listened to the testimony of Maj. Gen. Burr, of the General Staff, who is now Chief of Purchase, Storage and Traffic, and who succeeded Gen. Goethals, and that these shipments were made by order of his predecessor.

Gen. Burrs testimony is as follows:

Mr. REAVIS. Now, General, information has been brought to you in the last minute which relates to shipments after the dates you have given. From that information, what would be your statement as to any shipments of motor vehicles abroad in addition to those that you have just put into the record?

Gen. BURR. Since July 1, 1919, the records of our overseas transportation service show that no motor vehicles have been shipped.

Mr. REAVIS. Now, General, are you in possession of information as to why these shipments were made abroad after the armistice was signed?

Gen. BURR. As a matter of general knowledge, yes, Mr. Chairman. It was known to all Army officers who were connected with the service that during the last months of the war preceding the armistice there were continued and insistent calls for motor transportation. And I may say that after the armistice, a month or two afterwards, when it was necessary to send the Third Army into Germany, it was practically—in order to outfit it—it was practically necessary to take the motor transportation from the other two armies in France. Gen. Pershing had been insistently demanding in the last few months before the armistice that we get motor equipment over there. Every energy was being exerted to ship it. We practically reached the peak of production on motor equipment when the armistice was signed. We had quantities of material ready for shipment at the dock, and they were still asking for this transportation; and that fact and the shortage of equipment over there will account for the seemingly large shipments in December and January, and possibly in February. At that time, and now, the war was not over, and at that time the military officials deemed it wise to have our troops over there measurably equipped with transportation, because an army that hasn't transportation is immobilized.

Mr. REAVIS. The point that I had in mind, General, was this: Were these very large shipments, running into the tens of thousands of motor vehicles, after the armistice, based upon orders that came before the signing of the armistice or were they on orders subsequent to the armistice?

Gen. BURR. Well, first, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I have not figured it up, but the total figures that I have given you may run into tens of thousands, but they will not run over two tens of thousands; that is, not over 20,000. So they are a comparatively small number.

Mr. REAVIS. Well, without going into it quite as technically as that—because the addition can be made from your answers as to the number of thousands—what I would like to know is whether the War Department sent these to France on orders made before the signing of the armistice or on orders after the signing of the armistice.

Gen. BURR. I think on both.

On November 15, four days after the signing of the armistice, the department received a cablegram from the headquarters in France, stating the shortages for 30 divisions.

Mr. DONOVAN. Is that a copy of the telegram, General?

Gen. BURR. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Suppose you put it in the record. That will explain it.

Gen. BURR. I have a summary of it here, in which they asked for 6,450 light cars, 919 heavy cars, 1,096 reconnoissance cars, 1,602 staff observation cars, 1,590 machine-gun cars, 27,593 motorcycles with side cars, 573 light delivery trucks, 8,450 1½-ton trucks, 11,547 3-ton trucks, 751 gas trucks, 25,036 ammunition trucks.

Mr. REAVIS. Now, you are reading there from a cable received from whom?

Gen. BURR. This is a cable from the headquarters of the S. O. S. in France.

Mr. REAVIS. Would you be kind enough to let me see the cable, General?

Gen. BURR. This is merely a copy. The cable is S. 456 [handing the paper to Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. DONOVAN. What does "S. O. S." mean?

Gen. BURR. Services of Supply in France. That was Gen. Harbord's headquarters.

Mr. REAVIS. Now, General, how many divisions did we have in France?

Gen. BURR. I think we had 42 in the fighting line—42 fighting divisions—and in addition to that, of course, we had about 40 per cent of the fighting strength of the Army in the Service of Supply—in the S. O. S.—at the rear.

Mr. REAVIS. Now, it may be that I don't understand your system, but this cable, as I read it, doesn't call for the shipment of these to France.

Gen. BURR. It reports the shortages which were to be made up.

Mr. REAVIS. The cable reads, as I understand it:

"Paragraph 6. Motor Transport Corps. Following vehicles are the shortage that now exists in France to take care of 30 divisions. All vehicles floated during the month of October should be deducted from these figures, and the balance procured and floated at once. All orders placed in the United States for vehicles exceeding these requirements should be canceled."

Then, it goes on and gives the numbers you have just read. What cable did you get subsequent to that, if any, calling for motor vehicles—if that be an order for motor vehicles?

Mr. DONOVAN. May I see a copy of that telegram, please?

Gen. BURR. Yes, sir. [Handing the paper to Mr. DONOVAN.]

We had a cable December 7, 1918.

Mr. REAVIS. Before you answer that, General, I would like to have this cable—this is a copy of it, you say?

Gen. BURR. There is no question as to the accuracy of it.

Col. SEAMAN. The copy was made right in the cable office.

Mr. REAVIS. I would like to have that inserted at this point in the record.

(The paper referred to follows:)

"MOTOR VEHICLES SHIPPED TO FRANCE.

"[Extract from cablegram S. 456, Nov. 15, 1918.]

"Par. 6. Motor Transport Corps: Following vehicles are the shortages that now exist in France to take care of 30 divisions. All vehicles floated during the month of October should be deducted from these figures and the balance procured and floated at once. All orders placed in the United States for vehicles exceeding these requirements should be canceled: Ten thousand six hundred and twenty-eight bicycles; 6,450 motor cars, light; 919 motor cars, heavy; 1,096 cars, reconnoissance; 1,602 cars, staff observation; 1,590 cars, machine guns; 27,593 motor cycles with side cars; of 573 trucks, light delivery; 8,450 trucks, cargo 1½ and 2 ton; 11,547 trucks, cargo 3 to 5 ton; 751 trucks, gas tank, 3 tons; 25,036 trucks, ammunition; 24 field-lighting sets; 2,144 trucks, light aviation; 74 trucks, photographic; 52 trucks, balloon winch; 61 trucks, tender for balloon winch; 53 trucks, radio repair, Air Service; 53 trucks, radio operating, Air Service; 779 trucks, self-dump, Engineers; 140 water tanks, 5 to 5 tons; 313 trucks, wrecking, 3 to crane MTC; 868 trailers, 2 wheels, box body, Air Service; 338 trailers, spare parts, Air Service; 1,319 trailers, 21-foot, 2-wheel, platform, Air Service; 58 trailers, water tanks, Air Service; 80 trailers, photographic, Air Service; 2,188 trailers, 3-ton, 4-wheel, cargo; 74 trailers, chart room, Air Service; 877 trailers, 1½ to 2 ton cargo; 1,530 trailers, water cart; 136 trailers, tires press; 78 trailers, 4-wheel, 3-ton, pole; 140 trucks, water tanks, ¾-ton; 58 trucks, degassing outfits; 704 trucks, cargo, 4-wheel drive; 14 trucks, water-purification; 393 trucks, machine-shop; 442 trucks, light repair, MTC; 750 Ford ambulance chassis, "A" "A" "S"; 2,550 ambulances, Ford; 2,400 ambulances, G. M. C. All other motor vehicles not enumerated herein, with the exception of special ordnance vehicles, can be canceled. Ordnance Department will report separately all ordnance items not appearing herein."

Now, what further cable did you receive?

Gen. BURR. We have a cablegram, S. 572, December 7, 1918, of which I have an extract here.

Mr. REAVIS. Will you permit me to look at it, General? Just mark the extract that you think is pertinent to this.

Gen. BURR. I don't think all of it is pertinent, Mr. Chairman, but it is instructions as to the shipment of ordnance motor vehicles [handing paper to Mr. Reavis].

Mr. REAVIS. I notice in the cablegram of December 7 it says:

"Continue shipment of only sufficient ordnance, motor vehicles, load material, to supply adequate replacement and Slater spare parts for all load material and loads already shipped."

Now, at that time the department, so far as ordnance motor vehicles was concerned, was calling only for a supply sufficient to take care of adequate replacements?

Gen. BURR. Yes. Now, to indicate what would be the extent of shipments under that, I would have to have more knowledge of the exact condition of the ordnance equipment in France than I have. They apparently state in that cable that in order to repair tractors already shipped, it has been necessary to take apart complete tractors and use them as spare parts. So they wanted spare parts and also additional machines to replace.

There was great delay during the months of September and October, 1918, in the floating of motor vehicles to France; the American Expeditionary Forces never had more than 40 per cent of motor vehicles for its requirements. Cablegrams dated October 12, 16, 18, and November 14, and even on the day of the signing of the armistice, were received by Gen. Goethals, who was then in command of the Purchase, Storage and Transport division of the Quartermaster Corps earnestly urging the necessity for the early arrival and explaining the injury done the service in France by the delay in their receipt. The War Department in most instances had the vehicles at the docks. The delay was caused by the lack of bottoms in which to ship them. Gen. Goethals, careful of the Government's interests which he had so long and faithfully served, on November 30, 1918, sent a cable after he had been in receipt of one calling for the shipment of motor vehicles to Gen. Pershing, asking to be advised if there was necessity for the shipment of the vehicles required in a cablegram received by him from Pershing on November 15, 1918. Again, on December 11, 1918, Gen. Goethals cabled Gen. Pershing to be advised if the shipments which he had made in November in accordance with the requirements received in the cablegram of November 15, 1918, would make unnecessary the shipping of the December requirements contained in the cablegram dated December 11, 1918. Thus, gentlemen, you will see on two specific occasions Gen. Goethals by cable assured himself by receipt of a return cable of the necessity for these requisitioned motor vehicles referred to.

In December, 1918, Gen. Harbord, chief of the Services of Supply, by the direction of Gen. Pershing, cabled Gen. Goethals in reply to his inquiries of November and December, 1918, asking for advice, as follows:

[Cable to Gen. Harbord #323, November 30, 1918.]

PST Paragraph 1. Reference S 487, paragraph 1, and S 502, paragraph 4 B, extremely important that we receive advice at once as to December priority for motor transportation. Reference X 316, paragraph 7, suggesting shipment of 2,500 trucks and 1,000 cars, do you not think it advisable to eliminate all shipments of motor transportation after December 1st except spare parts and tires? Trucks and cars shipped during December, after allowing time for voyage, unloading, erection, etc., will not be available for use in France until the end of January, at which time there will presumably be a large reduction in force. Advise quickly. GOETHALS.

[Extract of "S" cablegram. No. 629. December 16, 1918.]

Paragraph 5. For purchase and chief Motor Transport Corps. Reference X 343, paragraph 9 F. Need for heavy motors care, especially urgent, due to needs for transportation in connection with peace negotiations; request effort be made to ship as requested in December. Advise. HARBORD.

[Extract—X 348—December 11, 1918.]

S. & P. Paragraph 2. Shipments for the month of November, as follows: Motors and vehicles: Automobiles, heavy, 303 each; light, 767 each; motor cycles and side cars; side cars only, 3,633; each motor cycles, Solo, 2,935 each; bicycles, 3,851 each; trucks, light delivery, 867 each; type A, medium, one and one-half to two ton, 715 each; type B, heavy, three to four ton, 2,652 each; heavy cargo, five-ton, 45 each; dump, 10 each; light aviation, 73 each; ammunition, 2,214 each; chassis; light delivery, 129 each; type A, medium, one and one-half to two ton, 306 each; type B, heavy, three to four ton, 988 each; heavy cargo, five-ton, 57 each; dump, 20 each; light aviation, 250 each; ammunition, 104 each; ambulances; Ford, complete, 132 each; Ford chassis, 4 each; G. M. C., type AA, complete, 34 each; type AA chassis, G. M. C., 684 each; G. M. C., type AA bodies, 647 each; trailers, 691 each; casing tires and tubes, 6,045 each. Reference S 551, paragraph 4, see X 326, paragraph 18. Advise if this will change December requirements.

GOETHALS.

[Extract X-644. December 18, 1918.]

Paragraph 4. For purchase, and Chief, Motor Transport Corps. Reference S, 348, paragraph 2. This will not change December requirements.

HARBORD.

Gen. Goethals not only forthwith shipped the November and December motor-vehicle requirements requested by Gen. Pershing, but honored all requisitions for subsequent motor-vehicle requirements thereafter up to and including February and March, 1919.

Gentlemen, I know you will agree with me that with Gen. Pershing requisitioning motor-vehicle requirements and demanding their immediate floating and stating the injury that the nonreceipt of them was occasioning the service, and with Gen. Goethals assuring himself by cablegram from Gen. Pershing for the necessity for the floating of these requisitioned motor-vehicle requirements, it will come with exceeding poor grace for any Member of this House who may follow me here to-day to attempt to lay an indictment of waste or extravagance by the War Department in the shipping of motor vehicles to France since the signing of the armistice, when it was done by the request and under the direction of the two foremost American generals of this generation.

Of all the detestable, cheap demagoguery ever indulged in, in my opinion, was that which was in fashion during the war and extended up to the time when this House had submitted to it for its consideration the sterile, impotent, twin resolution—the one now under consideration and the one relating to the disposal of Army surplus food products—for Members of this great body to recklessly vilify and impugn the motives of the men who have attained great prominence in the business world for their high character and ability, who gave their services to their country in the time of its greatest stress, to be charged in this Chamber with a selfish personal and business interest in the management and disposal of the surplus products and equipment over which in their governmental capacity they have jurisdiction. I trust that those Members of the House who are to follow me in the discussion of this resolution now under consideration will forego the temptation of such an unseemly and unjust practice and will not regard it necessary to assail the character or the intention of any reputable business man such as I have described that may now be connected in a prominent governmental capacity to advance or promote either a partisan or a personal object.

Gentlemen, I urge you to vote for this resolution, for by so doing you are, as I have already stated, indorsing the wise, sound, and economic policy now being employed by the War Department in disposing of its surplus motor vehicles. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DONOVAN. May I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am very reluctant to ask to proceed without interruption, but the facts which I have in mind and which I would like to lay before the membership are so voluminous that I fear it will be impossible for me to call them to your attention within the time allotted to me. I would therefore appreciate it very much if the House would be good enough not to interrupt me unnecessarily in order that I may economize my time.

I desire to discuss this resolution without partisan bias. I have no intention to indulge in unnecessary criticism. I merely want to lay the facts, as developed by the testimony, before the House in order that you may draw your own conclusions. A brief word of explanation of the policy and system adopted by the War Department for the sale of the surplus Army material, and especially for the sale of surplus automobiles, may be helpful in arriving at a correct conclusion regarding the situation.

The General Staff determines how much automobile equipment is required for the Army, and these requirements, so far as motor vehicles are concerned, are turned over to the Motor Transport Corps, of which Brig. Gen. Drake is chief. The Motor Transport Corps then declares a surplus of all motor vehicles in excess of the requirements of the Army, as shown by the order of the General Staff. This declaration of surplus on the part of the Motor Transport Corps is turned over to the sales department, upon receipt of which it becomes the duty of the sales department to make plans for the disposition and sale of such surplus. The Motor Transport Corps can not act with reference to declaring a surplus until the requirements of the Army are made known by the order of the General Staff, and the sales department can not act with reference to the disposition of the surplus until the Motor Transport Corps has made a declaration of surplus. So we have three departments through which the matter must go before the surplus can either be transferred or sold.

The department of sales, whose duty it is to determine the policy of sale, is an organization which came into the War Department during the progress of the Worlds War. I think Gen. Goethals was responsible for the creation of the department of sales. The Secretary of War conceived the idea that the department of sales should be largely controlled by what he is pleased to term experts. I am not prepared to say that the disposition of all the Army surplus is in the hands of these so-called experts, but I do know that the sale of every commodity which Subcommittee No. 4 has investigated is controlled by one of these experts, and that in every instance the expert is connected with some organization in civil life whose commodity will be brought in direct competition with the Army product when it is sold.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I will.

Mr. CALDWELL. Would you have the material sold by some one who did not know anything about it?

Mr. REAVIS. In answer to the question, permit me to say that I would be perfectly willing to trust the gentleman from New York, or any other man of honesty and average intelligence, to sell a Cadillac car by auction, as this resolution provides. In fact, I would greatly prefer to trust the gentleman from New York to sell these commodities for the Government if he had no personal interest in the matter than to trust some expert to sell it for the Government when it came into competition with his own product. [Applause.] Bearing in mind the duty of the director of sales and the functions of his department, it may be interesting to know that the first statement of policy of the sales department was issued in January of this year, and is as follows:

It is the policy of the director of sales to dispose of the surplus property of the War Department so as to disturb the industrial conditions of the country as little as possible.

I may say to you, after having spent nearly five months in listening to testimony disclosing the activities of the sales department, that I have become convinced that the policy as originally announced has been religiously adhered to by the sales department ever since.

The first declaration of surplus motor vehicles, as disclosed in the testimony of Brig. Gen. Drake, in serial 5, part 8, of the hearings of Subcommittee No. 4——

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I mean no discourtesy to the gentleman, but will he kindly permit me to read this testimony?

Mr. CALDWELL. I understand; but I asked for time, and they would not give it to me.

Mr. REAVIS. I am not responsible for that. On the 4th of September Brig. Gen. Drake, under oath, made the following statement:

Mr. REAVIS. And these 500, or approximately 500, pleasure cars which I have personally seen were vehicles that were to be sold to the general public rather than turned over to the departments?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. Now, when did you order that survey made?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. I do not remember the date. It was during a visit with Col. Miller at Camp Holabird. I have here a letter from Col. Chitty of July 19, which states as follows:

"The vehicles here—488—authorized for sale on February 13 last are still being held, pending disposition by the Division of Purchase, Storage, and Traffic."

Col. Chitty was the commanding officer in charge of Camp Holabird, and his letter discloses that these 488 passenger cars had been declared surplus on the 13th of February, which declaration imposed the duty on the sales department to immediately dispose of them, and yet nothing had been done on the 19th of July.

I have seen these vehicles. During all of that time they were standing in the open, with no protection, subjected to the elements, rapidly covering with rust, the tops rotting, the upholstery tearing loose, the paint faded and cracked, and the department of sales doing absolutely nothing with reference to their disposition, though Camp Holabird is only 50 miles from the city of Washington and from the office of the department of sales.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. With pleasure.

Mr. DONOVAN. Was it not true that the inventory or surplus declared, referred to in that statement, had the names of the cars but not their condition and where they were located and what their use had been, and the sales department for that reason in the statement said it would not give sufficient information for the transfer department to sell them?

Mr. REAVIS. No; that is not true.

Mr. DONOVAN. That is true.

Mr. REAVIS. It is not true; and it is no defense if it were true. Your statement would indicate that the chief of the Motor Transport Corps declared a surplus in February of 500 passenger cars within 50 miles of Washington and that they were permitted to stand in the open without action until July because the War Department, through the chief of the Motor Transport Corps, had not given the sales department sufficient information to justify the sale. If the sales department was refusing to act because of any such insufficient information, do you not think that there was time between the 13th of February and the 19th of July to have secured this information? Certainly there was time for these cars to be practically ruined by exposure. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Not any further at this time. Whoever was at fault, whether it was the sales department or the Motor Transport Corps, it is very certain that the fault of one or the other resulted in 500 passenger cars standing in the open with no protection from the 13th of February to the 19th of July, at the time the letter of Col. Chitty was written; and, as a matter of fact, these cars stood there until the latter part of September following before they were sold.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman does not want to make a misstatement of facts. The gentleman says that was no protection.

Mr. REAVIS. I have not yielded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. REAVIS. It is true that the sales department, through Mr. Hutchinson, offered, not as a reason but as an excuse for its failure to act, their statement that the chief of the Motor Transport Corps in his declaration of surplus was not sufficiently specific. The chief of the Motor Transport Corps, Brig. Gen. Drake, whom I regard as an exceptionally high-class man, a splendid officer, and a very frank and candid witness——

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I can not yield at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. REAVIS. As I was saying, Brig. Gen. Drake testified that his declaration was specific and the responsibility for the delay and the loss to the Government rested entirely with the sales department. The inactivity of the sales department was not confined to these 500 pleasure cars. In fact, the indifference of the sales department with reference to these cars is characteristic of its attitude toward all of the surplus motor vehicles. The testimony of Gen. Drake discloses this beyond question. On page 303 of part 8 will be found additional information regarding the conduct of the sales department:

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. In all, we sent 470 communications to the office of the director of sales regarding touring cars, trucks, and motor cycles.

Mr. REAVIS. Regarding the automobiles there, touring cars, trucks, etc., being unserviceable?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. When you reported to him that they were unserviceable, that they had been surveyed and found unserviceable, under jurisdiction of his office, that gave authority for him to sell from that report, did it not?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir; absolutely.

Mr. REAVIS. And how many of these reports have you sent him?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Four hundred and seventy.

Mr. REAVIS. What reply had you got to them?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. They were all returned with the letter I just mentioned.

Mr. REAVIS. And not an automobile sold?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. No, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. And you sent him 470 reports?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. These 470 orders that were sent from the department that declared a surplus to the department whose duty it was to sell as soon as the declaration was made, comprehended the surplus motor equipment in many camps throughout the country?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. These 470 reports did not all relate to vehicles in Camp Holabird, but to stations throughout the United States.

Mr. REAVIS. That is, at Cleveland, Chicago, Atlanta, Cincinnati, and all other places where motor vehicles were stored?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. Why did you only report to him the unserviceable cars?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Because we reported the total number of motor vehicles surplus, 36,352.

Mr. REAVIS. Is that the total motor-vehicle surplus in the Army in the United States?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. Has that surplus been growing greater, or has it been decreasing?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Just recently it was increased by the order of the Secretary of War declaring surplus 3,000 F. W. D. trucks, 279 Dodge cars, and 92 seven-passenger cars.

Mr. REAVIS. The greater proportion of them are serviceable, are they not?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. When were they reported to the director of sales?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. This was approved by the Acting Secretary of War on April 12 and was immediately transmitted to the director of sales.

Mr. REAVIS. Subtracting 3,000 from the total would leave approximately 37,000 automobiles that had been in his hands as surplus since April?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. Well, Gen. Drake, how many have been sold?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. To my knowledge, very few have been sold.

This testimony was given on the 4th of September. During the interim, from February until September, the director of sales, according to the testimony of Gen. Drake, had received 470 orders granting authority and imposing the duty to sell surplus motor vehicles. Gen. Drake testifies further that no communication was received by his office from the director of sales regarding these declarations of surplus until July, at which time the director of sales returned all of the declarations of surplus and all the orders to the Chief of the Motor Transport Corps, with the statement that he did not care to handle the proposition. From the time of the armistice, on the 11th of November, down until this hour these cars have been standing in the open, exposed to the elements, subjected to the storms of winter and summer, with absolutely no protection. The paint has cracked, the hoods are covered with rust, the upholstering and tops have rotted, and practically no effort has been made on the part of those charged with the duty of selling them to dispose of them.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. With pleasure.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman tell us how many cars were covered by these 470 orders?

Mr. REAVIS. It is impossible for me to do that. I would have to make a computation which I have not done, but there were several thousands. Brig. Gen. Drake was probably justified in expecting the sales department to dispose of these cars after the declaration of surplus. His duty was really performed when he declared the surplus and sent it to the sales department, but because of the inactivity of the sales department and because of the action of the sales department in sending all of the declaration of orders back during the month of July, Drake tried to get a different system that provided for the elimination of the sales department, that granted him authority to make the sale himself. On pages 301 and 302 of part 8, in the printed record of the testimony, the following is found:

Mr. REAVIS. Now, there is no intention of placing the responsibility where it should not go, but I want to get the facts in the record. The armistice came in November of last year. These automobiles, thousands of them, trucks and pleasure cars, have been standing in open storage, subjected to the snows of winter and the rains of summer, from that day down until this, and the department is just now, on September 1, having a survey made that will permit the sale of these vehicles, s that correct?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. Who is responsible for that delay?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. The idea from the beginning was to transfer all vehicles of whatever class to some one of the other departments. We had no authority to do this, and I had no authority to hold a sale of the vehicles during that time.

Mr. REAVIS. I know that, General. I am not trying to fix any responsibility on you any more than I am on anyone else. I am just trying to find out what has been done. There has been absolute criminal waste with reference to this thing. Both Mr. MACGREGOR and myself have gone personally to Camp Holabird and have seen the condition of these cars. To anyone who realizes the necessity of his Government for money and the burden that taxation is placing upon the citizens of this country, it is appalling. I am not claiming that you had any authority to sell these. I think probably you did not have the authority, but the director of sales did have the power, did he not?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. And all the authority necessary for the sale there when you gave him the list last February?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. And he did absolutely nothing until July, so far as you know?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. And all that he did in July was to notify you that he did not want to act under the authority that you had given him in February?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Well, it was my suggestion as to handling this sale, this action of August 1.

Mr. REAVIS. But I say that the first thing that the director of sales did from February to July, notwithstanding the exposed condition of these cars, was to notify you in July that he did not want to act under the authority that you gave him in February?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. And that he did not want to perform the duty that the jurisdiction of his office imposed upon him. That was, in effect, what he said, was it not?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. That was the effect. I do not know his reasons.

The conduct of the sales department, with reference to these automobiles, is in entire harmony with the avowed policy announced in January, that the surplus war material would be so sold as not to disturb industrial conditions. I know of no better way to prevent such disturbance than to permit these cars to rot and go to ruin as they were permitted to do.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman construe the phrase "not to disturb industrial conditions" to mean not to reduce prices?

Mr. REAVIS. It manifestly can have no other meaning.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it not a fact that in the case of another investigation that the gentleman's committee undertook, to wit, the food situation, the War Department declined to sell articles of food on the ground that it would reduce the price of food?

Mr. REAVIS. They not only declined to sell the food but they added the food unnecessarily to the ration of the soldiers, with the intention of compelling the soldiers to eat it so they could not be forced to sell it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And that is the way they are reducing the high cost of living.

Mr. REAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Wait a moment. Just a word further regarding the sale of this food. I drew and introduced the resolution calling upon the Secretary of War to take this food out of the warehouses, where it was rotting and going to ruin, and to permit the American people, who at great sacrifice bought and paid for it, to consume it; and immediately after the passage of that resolution the President addressed the Congress and took credit to the administration for the fact that they were selling the Army food, but he said nothing about the fact that it had been permitted to lay in the warehouses for nine months and was not sold until, under my resolution, a Republican Congress forced them to sell it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I yield to a question.

Mr. DONOVAN. Did not the gentleman ask Mr. Hutchinson this very question, whether or not it was the policy of the War Department to keep automobiles off the market to aid the dealers, and did not he reply, in serial 5, pages 9 and 10, that they had had requisitions for concrete mixers for several other parties for road building and that they were not selling to the States for the very reason that they did not want to be charged with doing what you are now charging them with? That these cars primarily were to go to the Government and to the departments, and then the unserviceable surplus was to be sold. Is not that a fact?

Mr. REAVIS. It is quite possible that he answered that. I do not now recall whether he did or not.

Mr. DONOVAN. He did.

Mr. REAVIS. If he did so answer, his statement is out of harmony with every movement his department has made for 11 months.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Not any further now, if you please. It is well to bear in mind that during the time the Motor Transport Corps was seeking to have these machines sold that there were 130,000 motor vehicles held by the War Department in the United States. I will not take the time to quote the testimony, but it is disclosed on page 316, part 8. Before this war started the total motor vehicles needed for the Army of the United States was but 4,000. It must have been very apparent to anyone of average intelligence that there was a tremendous surplus of these vehicles. It was known to all bureaus of the War Department that there was no storage sufficient to take care of this tremendous number of machines. No farmer would permit his farm implements to lie out in the open all winter, and yet farm implements, because of the character and material of their construction, would not deteriorate in any degree as an automobile would when so exposed.

Notwithstanding winter was approaching, notwithstanding the tremendous loss that the Government would suffer by permitting these cars to stand in the open, absolutely nothing was done to either sell them or to provide storage. This indifference on the part of the War Department to the rights and the welfare of the American people is beyond understanding, but the testimony is undisputed in this record that this condition continued through all of the winter and practically through all of the past summer. I am criticizing this not as a partisan but as an American. It is my firm belief, after months spent in this investigation, that the sales department should be reorganized. I do not believe that men can serve two masters, and I think the time has come to put men in charge of the sale of Army surplus who are entirely disinterested and who would be actuated by the sole desire to get the largest sum they could for the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think some gentleman higher up should have the responsibility?

Mr. REAVIS. Somebody higher up has been advised all the time of what has been going on. Not a man in the sales department nor in any other bureau of the War Department would remain there overnight if it were not with the consent of somebody higher up.

Mr. KNUTSON. Who created this sales department.

Mr. REAVIS. I really do not know; probably it was Gen. Goethals.

Mr. KNUTSON. Who appointed Gen. Goethals?

Mr. REAVIS. The Secretary of War appointed Gen. Goethals; and there is no man in this sales department who would remain there an hour if the Secretary of War desired his removal.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Certainly; for a question.

Mr. BLACK. Can the gentleman give us any figures as to how much the aggregate of sales has been up to date by the sales department?

Mr. REAVIS. I can put it in the RECORD; I can not give you the figures now. I have not made the computation, though it is all fully disclosed in the printed testimony. It would require several computations to make an intelligent answer.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. REAVIS. For a brief question.

Mr. KNUTSON. What is the pay of the director of the sales department?

Mr. REAVIS. I do not know what his salary is. I do know he does not earn it, whatever it is.

Mr. KNUTSON. Has the attention of the Secretary of War been called to the condition that the gentleman has disclosed?

Mr. REAVIS. Not by me.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not the duty of the Secretary of War to know what is going on in his department, in the sales department as well as elsewhere?

Mr. REAVIS. It is manifestly his duty, and if he is not doing it his failure to perform that duty is costing the American people millions upon millions because he has not performed it. How much time have I used, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. REAVIS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of War appointed the director of sales at a salary of $25,000, and also appointed the liquidation commission?

Mr. REAVIS. I recall now that the Assistant Secretary of War, without legislative authority, appointed the director of sales at a salary of $25,000, which the Senate reduced to $12,000 a year. That had escaped my memory for a moment.

Let me return to the attitude of the director of sales with reference to the disposal of these machines. Gen. Drake, to be quite fair with him, had done everything in his power to get these cars disposed of. He was very evidently irritated at the long and unnecessary delays. He tried repeatedly to get the War Department to authorize him to sell, but up until the 1st of September all of his requests along this line were summarily refused. On page 312, of part 8 of the testimony, he confessed that he did not know why the sales department had refused or neglected to dispose of the cars.

Mr. REAVIS. You and I have both seen them and both know of the conditions. I want to put into the record just the way they are. The paint in some instances is off, is it not?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir; in part or——

Mr. REAVIS. In some places the hoods are covered with rust?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. The tops have been rotted, have they not, by being exposed to the elements?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. They have been bleached; of course, injured to a certain extent.

Mr. REAVIS. Well, I can show you pictures of where they hang down from having rotted. Do you know of any cases of that kind?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. I know that would happen in the high winds that prevail.

Mr. REAVIS. The upholstery has lost its luster, and in some places destroyed so that the packing is sticking through. General, do you think a car in that condition would be as salable as a car not in that condition?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. I do not think so.

Mr. REAVIS. If it were your automobile, you would rather have it in a garage, would you not?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. The director of sales has had 17,000 and more of these automobiles exposed to the elements deteriorating, as I have described, and as you have agreed, since April, without a sale being made?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. Do you know why?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. No, sir; I do not know their policy in regard to sales.

Sometimes it is possible to determine the reason for conduct on the part of an individual by the surrounding circumstances. It is very difficult for anyone to understand how an official of the Government would willfully permit motor vehicles to be destroyed in this way, if the official had at heart the best interests of the people of this country. The one who had charge of the sale of these automobiles for the sales department was Mr. Guy Hutchinson, who was called before the committee and who was given every opportunity to state fully his side of this disputed question. One of the questions that was asked him was with reference to his former employment before being called to take charge of the sale of Government motor vehicles, and he made this answer:

Mr. REAVIS. Before entering the War Department, what activity were you engaged in?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I was in the automobile business.

Mr. REAVIS. Where?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I was general manager for the Willys-Overland Co. in New York

Mr. REAVIS. That is, for the company manufacturing that car?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The Willys-Overland Co., their home office in New York.

Some time after testifying before the committee Mr. Hutchinson requested the privilege of again testifying, in order to correct certain inaccurate statements that he had made in the first instance. In this correction will be found, on page 403, of part 9, the following:

Mr. HUTCHINSON. All right; I will do it that way. On page 570 of the reporter's transcript of my testimony of September 4 I am quoted as replying to the inquiry as to where I was in the automobile business as follows:

"I was general manager for the Willys-Overland Co. in New York."

The answer shou'd read:

"I was the general manager for the Willys-Overland Co. (Inc.), of New York City."

Mr. REAVIS. At that point let me ask you this question: What is this company of which you were the general manager?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. It is the New York district branch of the Willys-Overland Co.

Mr. REAVIS. Is it an automobile company?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes, sir.

So we have the situation of a man in charge of the sales of the Government surplus automobiles who was the general manager of an automobile company just before he took his present position. Not a passenger car can be sold on behalf of the Government that will not come into competition with the product of the company for which the Government agent was general manager before taking his present position. I do not know of any better way to keep Government automobiles from being sold than to place the sale of them in the hands of men who must necessarily have a personal interest in keeping them off the market. I do not know any better way to keep from disturbing industrial conditions by the sale of Government automobiles than to put the power of the sale in the hands of one who was formerly general manager for an automobile company. These experts in the sales department should be removed and removed at once. Men should be put in that department who have but one allegiance, and that allegiance should be to the Government for which they act. It is impossible to tell how many millions of dollars have been lost by the carelessness and indifference with reference to surplus motor vehicles. After a close investigation and a sincere study of the matter I have but small conception as to what this loss actually is. That it is tremendous will be undisputed, and that it is needless and unnecessary is equally apparent.

For months the Motor Transport Corps has been endeavoring to get some of these cars and trucks transferred to the Agricultural Department to be utilized in the construction of roads that are built in whole or in part by Federal aid. Mr. McDonald, chief of the Highway Commission, has been equally insistent. He testifies that he has had personal interviews with the Secretary of War and with all other departments directly or indirectly connected with this disposition. The allocation of something in excess of 22,000 motor vehicles was made to the Highway Department months ago. Full authority of law was granted by Congress to make such transfer last February, but only about 8,000 of the 22,000 have been transferred up to the 20th of last month, or for 11 months these cars stood exposed to the elements, deteriorating in value, when they should have been of use in the construction of the highways of the Nation.

There has been some disposition on the part of the sales department to blame the Highway Commission for its delay in making this transfer, but Mr. McDonald, when this criticism was called to his attention, testified as follows:

Mr. REAVIS. But you had your allotment in the hands of the War Department long before that?

Mr. MCDONALD. From May 15, I believe. I haven't the exact date here.

Both Mr. McDonald and Brig. Gen. Drake testified that they are in hopes that an immediate transfer of these vehicles can be effected, for the reason that within the past two weeks they have secured authority from the Secretary of War to eliminate the sales department as a clearing house between the Motor Transport Corps and the Highway Commission and to make the transfer directly from the Motor Transport Corps to the Highway Commission. If the Secretary of War will just follow this order up with another order that will eliminate the sales department with reference to the sale of these machines or will so reorganize the sales department that the selling agent of the Government will have no interest of his own to serve, the surplus motor vehicles will be readily disposed of.

I do not intend by what I have said to entirely relieve the Motor Transport Corps of responsibility for some of the losses the Government has suffered. It is within the knowledge of all Members of Congress that millions of dollars have been appropriated and spent for the construction of repair shops, and that we are keeping a very large personnel of experts, many thousands, in fact, to repair motor equipment. Up to this time no serviceable passenger car has been sold. I mean by that, no new passenger car has been sold. Actuated by the desire not to disturb industrial conditions, these cars have been permitted to stand in the open until they are practically wrecks before any effort has been made to sell them. Notwithstanding we have ample facilities in the way of repair shops and skilled mechanics by the thousands, no effort has been made to repair these wrecks before offering them for sale. Brig. Gen. Drake, on page 286 of part 8, testified as follows:

Mr. REAVIS. When you speak of unserviceable, I take it that you mean automobiles or motor vehicles that are not serviceable from the Army viewpoint, and not standard?

Brig. Gen. DRAKE. In this connection they were vehicles that were susceptible—many of them susceptible—of repairs, but we did not deem it proper to repair them, in view of the number of serviceable new vehicles that we had on hand.

I think this answer discloses the viewpoint of the War Department and the viewpoint of the average man who has spent his life in the Army. I am not sure that I understand the psychology of it, but, without attempting to analyze the reason for it, it is nevertheless true that so long as the needs of the Army are provided nothing else is of consequence. These cars could have been repaired with practically no additional expense to the Government, for we have on hand all the spare parts, we have the repair shops and the personnel of skilled mechanics, and when so repaired would have sold for a much larger sum than was secured for them. Yet, notwithstanding the money that the Government would have saved if such action had been had, the Chief of the Motor Transport Corps testifies that, inasmuch as they had so many new cars for Army officers to use, they saw no necessity to repair these old cars.

The resolution which I have introduced, and which is now before the House, calls on the Secretary of War to obey the law. Last January we passed a law authorizing the sale of surplus Army equipment. Last February we enacted a measure authorizing the transfer of motor equipment to the Highway Commission for the construction of roads built in whole or in part by Federal aid. Neither of these things has been done, though nearly a year has elapsed. The passage of this resolution and the publicity of the true condition will result in the sale and transfer of these motor vehicles, as a similar resolution introduced by me resulted in a sale of food. I do not believe that this resolution should be materially amended, though there is one amendment suggested to me by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] that should be adopted. This amendment which he has asked me to introduce provides for the transfer of spare parts which can be used on the vehicles to the Highway Commission. These spare parts are useless in the hands of the Government and would be of great service to the Highway Commission, and I think the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia should be adopted. I do not favor any additional amendments.

War is always waste and extravagance. It is out of harmony with a Christian civilization, and I sincerely trust will never again come to fret and trouble the children of men. War is sacrifice, and the instinct of patriotism impels the people of a nation to offer whatsoever sacrifice this instrument of a dark age may require. Many there are who offer the greatest sacrifice of which life is capable—the sacrifice of life itself—and far on the other side of the sea there are narrow strips of ground that mark the resting place of many American lads who gave to the Nation and to the world the sacrifice supreme. I had hoped against reason that war might not be profitable to anyone, and I should like very much if conditions could be brought about and perpetuated that would make it impossible for anyone to profit because of war. There are some, however, who have taken advantage of this abnormal condition to better their own material and financial welfare. This is not true of those whom I represent, for the greatest financial sacrifice that this administration has visited upon any class has been visited upon the farmer. His was the only product that was subjected to antagonistic legislation. His wheat was held at $2 a bushel at a time when across the imaginary line which separates America from Canada, and where there was no price fixing, Canadian wheat was selling at $3.60. Notwithstanding this, the American farmer patriotically planted a greater acreage of wheat than was ever planted in the history of the Nation before. His hogs were held at an arbitrary and fixed price, and now that the war is over his products are being hammered down and down until scarcely a thing that he sells is not sold at a loss.

While this condition was going on, and notwithstanding we had thousands of cars for which we had no storage, the War Department permitted the automobile companies to complete their war contracts. It was not said to them that we had no use for the cars, that we had no storage for them, that the people of the country were burdened with tremendous taxation, and for these and other reasons these contracts should be canceled. No; that was not said, but notwithstanding an underproduction of motor vehicles and the impossibility of the general public obtaining prompt delivery of automobiles, the Secretary of War has permitted the automobile companies to continue to deliver automobiles to the Government after the war was over. In the month of November and after the signing of the armistice, the automobile companies delivered to the Government, which we accepted and paid for, 18,928 motor vehicles. In December we received and paid for 11,677 motor vehicles; in January of this year, 16,053; in February, 9,540; in March, 7,452; in April, 3,509; in May, 1,521; in June, 783; and in July, 554. In other words, the War Department has bought and paid for 70,130 motor vehicles since the close of the war, while the total motor equipment of the Army before the war was but about 4,000 of these motor vehicles.

These new motor vehicles so received after the conclusion of the war were piled in the crates in which they were shipped, five high, in such quantities as to cover acres of ground. Over these crates was erected a temporary roof, similar to the protection that the farmer gives a haystack, and there they have stood since their delivery, and there they stand to-day. There are no sides to these buildings, and there is nothing to protect the cars from the elements save the roof which is over them and the crates in which they were shipped.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In addition to these cars accepted by the department after the war was over, we were also receiving a large number of machines in perfect condition from the Germans under the terms of the armistice.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. For a question only.

Mr. GARRETT. Were these machines delivered on contracts that had been entered into prior to the armistice?

Mr. REAVIS. These machines were all delivered on prewar contracts.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. For a very brief question.

Mr. DONOVAN. Was it not true that these cars sent after the armistice was signed were sent under the direction of Gen. Goethals, and was it not also true that during the war we had only 50 per cent of production, as testified to by Gen. Burr in Europe?

Mr. REAVIS. That is not true; but even if it were true, if we had 50 per cent of our needs for war purposes, we certainly had more than our needs for peace purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. How many automobiles were delivered to the War Department since the armistice was signed?

Mr. REAVIS. Seventy thousand one hundred and thirty. In this connection I want to call to the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs that the War Department is now holding for the new Army about 53,000 new motor vehicles. They are doing this on the theory that Congress is to authorize an Army of 500,000 men. If such authority were granted, and I hope it will not be, it would mean a motor vehicle for every 10 men in the Army. If the Military Committee materially reduced the Army below this figure it will, of course, vastly increase the number of surplus machines, and this Congress should by legislation not only compel the declaration of surplus for the reduced force, but should compel the immediate sale of the surplus. Otherwise the vehicles will be retained, as they have been retained in the past.

The result is that we are not only refraining from disturbing the industrial conditions by refusing to sell the surplus automobiles, but we are further preventing the disturbance of industrial conditions by continuing to buy motor vehicles running into the hundreds of millions at a time when the people are burdened almost beyond endurance by excessive taxation. When the war ceased somewhat suddenly on the 11th of November last year an armistice was agreed upon between the allied and associated nations on one side and the Central Powers on the other. Under the terms of this armistice a vast quantity of motor equipment was turned over to the United States by Germany. Immediately upon the signing of the armistice we started the demobilization of our Army. So rapidly was this accomplished that 800,000 soldiers were discharged and permanently out of the service 60 days after the signing of the armistice. The demobilization was carried on at the rate of about 80,000 men a week, so that by the 11th of May 2,250,000 soldiers, out of an army of 3,700,000 men, were discharged and out of the service.

It is quite apparent that the more soldiers discharged the greater the surplus of Army material. If you have motor cars on hand sufficient to equip an Army of three and a half million men you will have a very large surplus if the Army is reduced to a million men, so it follows that the rapid demobilization of the Army would immediately increase the surplus of motor vehicles.

Another thing to be taken into consideration is that with our Army coming home from France at the rate of nearly 300,000 a month all war material in France was rapidly becoming surplus because there was no army there to use it. Yet notwithstanding the vast quantity of motor vehicles we had in France, motor vehicles that we had shipped from this country, purchased from foreign countries, and received from Germany, the War Department continued to ship these vehicles to France after the war was over and at a time when our soldiers were being brought home. The very transports that would bring soldiers from France to America would return to France with automobiles for an army that was not there.

In the month of November and after the armistice we shipped 20,607 motor vehicles to France; in December we shipped 15,421; in January, 2,091; in February, 1,315; in March, 431; in April, 42; in May, 81; in June, 5, or a total shipment of new motor vehicles after the war was over of 39,993. This seems to me another most excellent way of keeping from disturbing industrial conditions with reference to the automobile industry in America.

Gen. Burr, under whose charge this was, justified these shipments when he testified before the committee in large measure on a cable order dated November 15, 1918:

[Extract from cablegram S. 456, Nov. 15, 1918.]

Paragraph 6. Motor Transport Corps.—Following vehicles are the shortages that now exist in France to take care of 30 divisions. All vehicles floated during the month of October should be deducted from these figures and the balance procured and floated at once. All orders placed in the United States for vehicles exceeding these requirements should be canceled: 10,628 bicycles; 6,450 motor cars, light; 919 motor cars, heavy; 1,096 cars, reconnaissance; 1,602 cars, staff observation; 1,590 cars, machine guns; 27,593 motorcycles with side cars; 573 trucks, light delivery; 8,450 trucks, cargo, 1½ and 2 tons; 11,547 trucks, cargo, 3 to 5 tons; 751 trucks, gas tank, 3 tons; 25,036 trucks, ammunition; 24 field lighting sets; 2,144 trucks, light aviation; 74 trucks, photographic; 52 trucks, balloon winch; 61 trucks, tender for balloon winch; 53 trucks, radio repair, Air Service; 53 trucks, radio operating, Air Service; 779 trucks, self dump, Engineers; 140 water tanks, 3 to 5 tons; 313 trucks, wrecking, 3 to crane, M. T. C.; 868 trailers, 2 wheels, box body, Air Service; 338 trailers, spare parts, Air Service; 1,319 trailers, 21-foot, 2-wheel platform, Air Service; 58 trailers, water tanks, Air Service; 80 trailers, photographic, Air Service; 2,188 trailers, 3-ton, 4-wheel cargo; 74 trailers, chartroom, Air Service; 877 trailers, 1½ to 2 ton cargo; 1,530 trailers, water carts; 136 trailers, tires press; 78 trailers, 4-wheel, 3-ton pole; 140 trucks, water tanks, ¾ ton; 58 trucks, degassing outfits; 704 trucks, cargo, 4-wheel drive; 14 trucks, water purification; 393 trucks, machine shop; 442 trucks, light repair, M. T. C.; 750 Ford ambulances, chassis "A" "A" "S"; 2,550 ambulances, Ford; 2,400 ambulances, G. N. C. All other motor vehicles not enumerated herein with the exception of special ordnance vehicles can be canceled. Ordnance Department will report separately all ordnance items not appearing herein.

It will be noted that this cable order was sent four days after the signing of the armistice, and at a time when it was impossible for anyone to tell just what the future would develop and just what the needs of our Army in France would be. Several cables were put into the record by Gen. Burr, but his justification for this large shipment is largely on this cable of November 15, and which is known as extract from cablegram S. 456.

At the conclusion of the general's testimony, I asked him to furnish me with a copy of all cablegrams ordering motor equipment or referring to the shipping of motor equipment after the conclusion of the war, and while these cables are very voluminous and require a good deal of time and effort to go over, I did run across a cable dated November 16, 1918, or just one day after the sending of the cablegram which the general uses as his justification for these shipments, and which cablegram the general did not give me at the time he testified before the committee. The cablegram is as follows:

[Extract from cablegram S. 463, Nov. 16, 1918.]

Paragraph 1. For the Chief of Staff and Embarkation: Disregard entirely paragraph 6 of S. 456. Motor transport requirements will be extensively reduced from figures given.

It will be noted that the order in the cablegram of November 15 remained in force just one day, and on the day following another cable is sent from the same source which says, "Disregard entirely" the cablegram of the day before.

There is another consideration to which I want to call the attention of the House and the country. In the month of August we sold to the French nation all of the motor vehicles we had in France, which were valued at $310,000,000, for 20 cents on the dollar, on 10 years' time. In other words, the motor equipment we had in France was worth approximately as much money as it cost to build the Panama Canal, and in this motor equipment were the 26,000 vehicles that we sent abroad after the war was over, after we had received the motor equipment from Germany, and after our troops were being brought home. It may be in bad taste at this particular time to register a protest against such shameless waste of the people's money. It may be with so many voices in the air appealing to us to be generous to other people that one is not justified in demanding that we be just to our own people. There is no one more sympathetic with the stricken people of the Old World than am I, but I must confess that generosity such as I have just revealed is an unwarranted disregard of the rights of the American people.

I have tried to discuss this measure without partisan feeling and without unnecessary criticism. I have tried to fairly and impartially lay the facts as revealed by the testimony before this House and before the country. Quite recently the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], in an address of some bitterness, accused me of delivering a partisan speech on the resolution calling for the sale of surplus Army food. I was not then conscious of delivering partisan remarks. I tried then, as I have tried now, to reveal the facts as I knew them; but I was speaking to a legislative measure with a constructive purpose, while the gentleman secured time for the sole purpose of talking politics. I was seeking to accomplish something for the good of the country. The gentleman was seeking to serve the ends of his party. I can not understand, if the gentleman is correct, why partisanship and the delivery of a partisan speech should be a virtue in him and at the same time a vice in me.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] has likewise this afternoon delivered a partisan speech, bitter in its criticism of the Republican Party and of the majority in this House. It may be that I am mistaken and that my remarks have been partisan and that they were partisan on the food resolution. It may be that the gentleman is right and that I am wrong, but I spoke only for the rights of the American people; I spoke that they might be permitted to consume the food which they had at great sacrifice purchased and paid for. It may be that that is a partisan purpose, for in this day and age, under the autocratic régime of the great internationalist, one may not speak for the sovereignty of this Nation and for the rights of its people unless his words constitute an indictment of the purposes and plans of this administration. It may be that the charge of the gentleman from Mississippi is correct, for it seems that neither in this Chamber nor elsewhere in this country may one speak for the citizens of America either to serve the present generation or to safeguard the interests of the generations of the long future, unless some Democrat arises to accuse him of talking politics.

I sincerely trust that never in the history of the Republican Party will it be the advocate of principles which antagonize those who speak for the Republic or the peoples of the Republic. I sincerely hope that in the future, as now, the Republican Party shall stand as the protector of American rights, American independence, and American sovereignty, so that one who raises his voice in defense of any or all of these may justly subject himself to the charge that he delivers a Republican address.

Criticism has been indulged in by these and other gentlemen of the expense of this investigating committee. I do not know what that expense is, but I do know that it is comparatively trivial. I have not the figures at my command, but they will shortly be given to the House, and will disclose that for the few thousand dollars this committee has taken from the Treasury it has put more than a hundred millions back in. As a business proposition, it is scarcely subject to the criticism that certain Members who seek to discredit the committee have indulged in.

But there is a larger aspect than the one of finance, and that is the aspect of beneficial service to the people. The hardships that present conditions impose upon the very poor are as apparent as they are distressing. They are hardships which embitter those who suffer and create rebellion against existing order. Men whose families hunger do not analyze economic conditions in their search for causes. Very few of them acknowledge the abnormal conditions which have so disturbed the equilibrium of the world. They prefer charges against the Government, against men in high places, and their charges fall upon ready, if not eager, ears. It is not pleasant to disclose unworthy acts on the part of anyone, but the offense lies in the commission of the acts and not in the disclosures.

It is worth while to show the people that their interests are near the hearts of those who represent them. It is worth while to show that the Congress is determined they shall not be wronged. It will inspire confidence in government if by its acts the ruling power in the Nation at all times stands guard over the rights of the weak and helpless. Because of the work of this committee the surplus food which would have spoiled in warehouses found its way to the tables of the poor in every village and hamlet of the Nation. A glance at my mail would convince you of the gratitude of those for whom the burden of existence was thereby made a little lighter.

The passage of this resolution will send these vehicles out to the people who in the first instance purchased them, and will bring to the Treasury large sums of money to relieve in some degree the burdens of taxation under which we suffer. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. To submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to speak for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects; and the Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested to immediately deliver to the Secretary of Agriculture, for distribution among the highway departments of the several States, for use on roads constructed in whole or in part by Federal aid, the 22,195 motor vehicles for which requisition has heretofore been made by the Secretary of Agriculture; and that all other Army motor vehicles now or hereafter declared surplus be immediately offered for sale at public auction to the American people.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOODYKOONTZ: Page 1, line 10, after the word "people," insert: "Provided, That in the States where the highway department has no jurisdiction over the roads and highways within the exterior lines of cities and other municipalities of such States the highway department shall, so far as practicable, assign and set over to such cities or other municipalities an equitable proportion of the motor vehicles delivered to such highway department under the authority given hereunder."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman's amendment is not in order. It seeks to change the method of distribution, and the purpose of this resolution is not to change the method of distribution as now authorized by law, but to request the Secretary of War to proceed with the distribution. That amendment would not be germane, because it seeks to direct the action of the State highway commissions, and I think that is a subject over which Congress would have no jurisdiction, in the first place, and certainly is not germane to the resolution, in the next place. For that reason I make the point of order.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, my only object is to perfect the resolution. The purpose of the amendment is not intended in any way to be antagonistic to the resolution. In certain of the States the highway commissions have no jurisdiction over municipalities. That is so in my State. Were this resolution to be adopted in its present form, the vehicles assigned to that State would go to territory lying without municipalities, and just at the present time they are the most eager in demanding their proportionate share of these vehicles.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does the gentleman understand that this resolution gives anybody any authority to do anything?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes; that is the object of it.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman will read it, he will see that it does not.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The object of the resolution is to vest power in the Government to assign motor vehicles to States for use in highway improvements.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman will look at the resolution, he will see that it merely declares the sense of the House to be that the Secretary of War should be requested to do something. There is nothing that gives him any authority. The Senate bill (S. 3037) gives him some authority, but the Republican side of the House will not let that come out. The bill is in the Rules Committee, and the Republican Rules Committee is holding it. They are sitting around here talking about doing something——

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I yielded for a question, and the gentleman has injected a speech into my remarks. If the resolution grants no authority and merely voices the sentiment of this House, then I wish to supplement the resolution by saying the further sentiment of the House is that the vehicles be distributed in that manner.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think that the point of order made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] is well taken, and that this prescribes a duty to the Agriculture Department which is not authorized. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARRISON: Page 1, line 7, after the word "made," insert "or may hereafter be made"; and after the word "Agriculture," in same line, insert "motor equipment and spare parts"; in line 9, after the word "surplus," insert "not needed by Post Office or Public Health Service"; after the period in line 10 as an additional paragraph insert:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby requested to transfer free of charge to the Department of Agriculture, under the provisions of section 7 of the act approved February 28, 1919, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1920, and for other purposes,' for use in the improvement of highways and roads, as therein provided, the following war material, equipment, and supplies pertaining to the Military Establishment as are or may hereafter be found to be surplus and not required for military purposes, to wit, road rollers, graders, and oilers; sprinkling wagons; concrete mixers; derricks; pile-driver outfits complete; air and steam drill outfits; centrifugal and diaphragm pumps with power; rock crushers; clamshell and orange-peel buckets; road scarifiers; caterpillar and drag-line excavators; plows; cranes; trailers; rubber and steam hose; asphalt plants; steam shovels; dump wagons; hoisting engines; air-compressor outfits with power; boilers; drag, Fresno, and wheel scrapers; stump pullers; wheelbarrows; screening plants; wagon loaders; blasting machines; hoisting cable; air hose; corrugated metal culverts; explosives and exploders; engineers' transits, levels, tapes, and similar supplies and equipment; drafting machines; planimeters; fabricated bridge materials; industrial railway equipment; conveyors, gravity and power; donkey engines; corrugated metal roofing; steel and iron pipe; wagons and similar equipment and supplies such as are used directly for road-building purposes."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order. In my judgment, the amendment is not germane to the objects sought to be attained in the original resolution. The original resolution extends only to motor vehicles, and this includes a lot of other things that are not motor vehicles and that have no reference at all to motor vehicles. I think the amendment is not germane.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, the object of the resolution is simply to request the Secretary of War to make disposition of certain material that he is authorized to do under a previous statute. This simply extends the request, referring to the same statute, to other articles which are embraced in the statute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order is obviously well taken. The resolution applies simply to motor vehicles and the gentleman's amendment clearly applies to a great many other vehicles. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, before the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin is submitted, will the Chair permit me to suggest that certainly a part of my amendment is not subject to the criticism which has been offered.

The SPEAKER. If any part of it is subject to the point of order, the whole amendment is subject to the point of order. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BROWNE: Page 1, line 8, strike out lines 8, 9, and 10 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "also all war material, equipment, and supplies not needed for the purpose of the War Department but suitable for use in the improvement of highways. That said motor vehicles and road-building equipment be distributed among the highways departments of the several States, as provided by section 7 of the Post Office appropriation act approved February 28, 1919."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin is subject to the same objection as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Page 1, line 7, after the word "agriculture," strike out the words following to the end of the sentence and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and all additional motor vehicles now or hereafter declared surplus which can be used on said roads."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia and Mr. CANDLER. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 78.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and it is clear there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 113, nays 157, not voting 162, as follows:

Mr. WEBSTER with Mr. DEWALT.

Mr. WHEELER with Mr. BARKLEY.

Mr. WOODYARD with Mr. O'CONNOR.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REAVIS: After the word "Agriculture," in line 7, insert: "together with the equipment and spare parts which can properly be used with said motor vehicles."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRIGGS: Page 1, line 10, after the word "people," strike out the period and add the following: "under such regulations as will offer any citizen the opportunity to purchase one motor vehicle for personal use."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the amendment. It does not seem to me to be germane to the resolution. The resolution is simply a request, while this seems to be a mandate, a positive instruction, to the Secretary of War as to how he shall proceed. It does not seem to me it is proper under the circumstances.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I thought debate had been closed on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The point of order was being stated.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think this is in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRIGGS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 75, noes 87.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move an amendment. In line 8, after the words "motor vehicles," insert the words "except such as may be necessary for the Post Office Department and the Public Health Service."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARRISON: Page 1, line 8, after the word "vehicles," insert: "except such as may be necessary for the Post Office Department and for the Public Health Service."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts: Add at the end of the resolution the following language: "and that not more than one such motor vehicle be sold to any person, firm, or corporation."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 101.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CALDWELL moves to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department with instructions to report forthwith as a substitute therefor, Senate bill 3037, passed by the Senate October 22, 1919, which bill corresponds with H. R. 9412, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs October 14, 1919, as follows:

A bill (S. 3037) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer, free of charge, certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to the Department of Agriculture, Post Office Department, Navy Department, and the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service, and certain other surplus property to the Department of Agriculture, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to transfer, free of charge, such motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment, including spare parts, pertaining to the Military Establishment as are or may hereafter be found to be surplus and no longer required for military purposes, to (a) the Department of Agriculture, for use in the improvement of highways and roads under the provisions of section 7 of the act approved February 28, 1919, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1920, and for other purposes"; Provided, however, That no more motor-propelled vehicles, motor equipment, and other war material, equipment, and supplies, the transfer of which is authorized in this act, shall be transferred to the Department of Agriculture for the purposes named in section 7 of said act than said Department of Agriculture shall certify can be efficiently used for such purposes within a reasonable time after such transfer; (b) the Post Office Department for use in the transmission of mails; (c) the Navy Department upon the request of the Secretary of the Navy and with the approval of the Secretary of War; and (d) the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service under the provisions of section 3 of the act approved March 3, 1919, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines."

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is also hereby authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to transfer, free of charge, to the Department of Agriculture, under the provisions of section 7 of the act approved February 28, 1919, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1920, and for other purposes," for use in the improvement of highways and roads, as therein provided, the following war material, equipment, and supplies pertaining to the Military Establishment as are or may hereafter be found to be surplus and not required for military purposes, to wit: Road rollers, graders, and oilers; sprinkling wagons; concrete mixers; derricks; pile-driver outfits complete; air and steam drill outfits; centrifugal and diaphragm pumps with power; rock crushers; clamshell and orange-peel buckets, road scarifiers; caterpillar and dragline excavators; plows; cranes; trailers; rubber and steam hose; asphalt plants; steam shovels; dump wagons; hoisting engines; air-compressor outfits with power; boilers; drag, Fresno, and wheel scrapers; stump pullers; wheelbarrows; screening plants; wagon loaders; blasting machines; hoisting cable; air hose; corrugated-metal culverts; explosives and exploders; engineers' transits, levels, tapes, and similar supplies and equipment; drafting machines; planimeters; fabricated-bridge materials; wagons and similar equipment and supplies such as are used directly for road-building purposes.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is also hereby authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to transfer, free of charge, to the Department of Agriculture, for the use of the Forest Service, any telephone supplies pertaining to the Military Establishment as are or may hereafter be found to be surplus and no longer required for military purposes.

SEC. 4. That freight charges incurred in the transfer of the property provided for in this act shall not be defrayed by the War Department; and if the War Department shall load any of said property for shipment, the expense of said loading shall be reimbursed the War Department by the department to which the property is transferred by an adjustment of the appropriations of the two departments: Provided, however, That any State receiving any of said property for use in the improvement of public highways shall, as to the property it receives, reimburse the Department of Agriculture for all amounts paid by that department to the War Department in reimbursement of loading charges upon said property.

SEC. 5. That any State highway department to which is assigned motor-propelled vehicles and other equipment and supplies, transferred herein to the Department of Agriculture, may, in its discretion, arrange for the use of such vehicles and equipment, for the purpose of constructing or maintaining public highways, with any State agency or municipal corporation at a fair rental, which shall not be less than the cost of maintenance and repair of said vehicles and equipment. The title to said vehicles and equipment shall be and remain vested in the States for use in the improvement of the public highways, and no such vehicles and equipment in serviceable condition shall be sold or the title to same transferred to any individual, company, or corporation.

SEC. 6. That the provisions of the act of July 16, 1914 (38 Stats., p. 454), prohibiting the expenditure of appropriations by any of the executive departments or other Government establishments for the maintenance, repair, or operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, in the absence of specific statutory authority, shall not apply to vehicles transferred or hereafter to be transferred by the Secretary of War to the Department of Agriculture for the use of the department under the provisions of this act or under the provisions of section 7 of the act of February 28, 1919, referred to in section 1 hereof: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall be held or construed to modify, amend, or repeal the provisions of the last proviso under the item entitled "Contingencies of the Army," as contained in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion to recommit by inserting a bill in place of a House resolution would not be in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to recommit is not germane, either to the legislation under the rule or its subject.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard before the Speaker rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I have made this motion to recommit in all sincerity. The resolution before the House, as the Speaker will see from the very reading of it, only expresses an opinion. It carries no authority, it gives no power, and if it were passed in the form in which it is before the House to-day we would find ourselves in the very undesirable——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am going to discuss this, but I want to lay the predicate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire the gentleman to discuss the merits of it.

Mr. CALDWELL. I am not going to discuss the merits of it, but the technique of it. I feel I have a right to make a statement of fact.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman that the gentleman's discussion is entirely in the discretion of the Chair.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. It is simply for the purpose of enlightening the Chair as to the point of order, and for no other purpose, and the Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman on that, but will not hear the gentleman on the merits of the proposition.

Mr. CALDWELL. What I wanted to say to the Chair was this, that surely it can not be the idea of the Chair or the Members of this body that we are to devote a whole day to an idle nothing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair refuses to hear the gentleman further.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the motion to recommit very clearly, but, as I understand it, it proposes to substitute for the proposition suggested by the committee a Senate bill. Now, it clearly can not be germane to a House resolution to propose an amendment inserting the entire text of a Senate bill. I do not even know whether this Senate bill has been reported by the House committee or not. It is clearly not germane to the House proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the Senate bill, which passed the Senate on the 22d day of October, deals with the subject to which the resolution refers. The resolution makes a request. I have not a copy of the Senate bill before me, but my information is that the Senate bill does not direct, but either requests or perhaps authorizes.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman allow the Chair a question?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

The SPEAKER. This is a House resolution. The other is a bill. Does the gentleman think that a House resolution can be amended by substituting a bill?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that a bill could be substituted for the House resolution, and it would then have the effect of a House resolution. We might take any statute now on the books and direct that it be substituted for a House resolution, and if it is not broader than the House resolution, then it seems to me it would be competent to substitute that statute for the House resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, may I make one additional point? A Member of the House has a right to have any proposition upon which he is required to vote read before he votes upon it. This motion to recommit does not set out the Senate bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. Oh, yes, it does. We made the motion before we finished reading.

Mr. CANDLER. It sets out the Senate bill in full.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard for a moment. I am not entirely familiar with the provisions of the Senate bill, but the purpose underlying that measure was to grant legislation authorizing the Secretary of War to do certain things. The resolution before the House is a resolution requesting him to be obedient to law already enacted. Now, under a resolution asking the Secretary of War to follow the law it certainly is not in order to ask him to do something for which there is no legislative authority. There being no legislative authority, the Senate passed a bill granting the legislative authority. The resolution now before the House is a request to the Secretary of War to do that which the law already authorizes, and in the motion to recommit you have added to that a request to the Secretary of War to do something that the law does not authorize, and it is certainly not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, one moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. On the point made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], that the House resolution, which, of course, has not the force of law, can not be amended by a bill, which has the clause "Be it enacted, etc.," which is a law, the Chair at first blush, although it is an involved point, would be inclined to think that the point would be good; but the Chair is inclined to think that the Senate bill, to which reference is made, refers not only to automobile vehicles but to various other articles, and therefore the Chair thinks that clearly makes it subject to a point of order. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of the resolution will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 266, nays 0, answered "present" 3, not voting 163, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. BENHAM. I was not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not be recorded.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I would like to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I was not listening.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not be recorded.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

DEATH OF CAPT. WILLIAM MAX LONG.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to you and the House because you pause in our proceedings and permit me to announce that on Monday morning, November 3, 1919, at 8 o'clock, Capt. W. Max Long, familiarly called by his many friends "Cap." Long, who was on the old soldiers' roll and was doorkeeper at that door up there in the gallery of the House of Representatives, departed this life, being 75 years of age on October 28, 1919. He came here from Greencastle, Pa., and was with Speaker Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, while he was Speaker of the House of Representatives, and has been practically continuously in the Government service from that day until the day of his death. Speaker Randall, after his speakership expired, first secured him a place in the Coast and Geodetic Survey, where he remained for several years. After ex-Speaker Randall's death Capt. Long went out of the service of the Geodetic Survey, and Mrs. Randall took such an interest in him that she, through her efforts and influence, secured him a place, as I am informed, in the Supervising Architect's Office in the Treasury Department. He remained there until he obtained a position on the old soldiers' roll a few years ago as a doorkeeper of this House and served here until his death. He never tired talking about Speaker Randall and Mrs. Randall. They had been good to him, and one strong and very commendable characteristic of his nature was "gratitude." If you ever did him a kindness, he never forgot it. My wife and I attended his funeral this morning. He had been kind to us. His comrades on the old soldiers' roll attended the funeral at his residence, 325 First Street SE., in a body and acted as his pallbearers. A large concourse of people were present and offerings of flowers in great abundance were sent by sympathetic and sorrowing friends as an evidence of their high esteem. His casket was wrapped in the beautiful folds of the United States flag—the flag he loved and beneath which he had fought in the sixties.

The funeral services were conducted by Rev. Freely Rohrer, pastor of the Metropolitan Presbyterian Church, Fourth and I Streets SE., which were most beautiful and impressive. It was in this church that Capt. Long was married to Miss Virginia Tibbett, on November 25, 1868. She had gone before him many years ago and was waiting for him on the "other shore." He was laid to rest in beautiful Arlington National Cemetery, and the remains of his wife were removed and reinterred there beside him. He left surviving two sons and two daughters. His oldest daughter, Miss Mattie Long, lived with him and cared for him in life and tenderly nursed him unto death. His last words were spoken to her. He said, "The end is near. I am so happy. I am going to sleep now." And he entered peaceful sleep and without a struggle passed out into the "great beyond."

He possessed many admirable traits of character. He was noble, generous, kind, and big hearted. He was a true friend, devoted, thoughtful, and attentive to those who even in the smallest sense showed him a courtesy or a kindness. A good man, a splendid citizen, an elegant gentleman, and a faithful public servant has gone. In his going away there is a feeling of sadness in many hearts in the great Capital City of Washington among those who knew him and enjoyed his acquaintance and good fellowship. He was my friend, faithful and true, and I, with them, am sad to-day. Peace to his ashes and rest to his soul. May God bless and comfort his loved ones, who will be lonely without father.

BRIDGE ACROSS TENNESSEE RIVER AT DECATUR, ALA.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 10208, to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near the city of Decatur, Ala.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of H. R. 10208, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Limestone-Morgan Bridge Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Alabama, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a highway and interurban railway bridge and approaches thereto across the Tennessee River at or near the city of Decatur, Ala., at a point suitable to the interest of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906: Provided, however, That reasonable rates of toll may be charged and received for passage over said bridge, no rates for the passage of a single passenger on an interurban train to exceed 25 cents.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 9 insert the word "interests" in lieu of the word "interest."

In line 12, after the word "That," insert the following words: "subject to the provisions of said act."

In line 13, after the word "bridge" and the comma, insert the word "but."

In line 1, page 2, after the word "no," insert the word "charge," and strike out the word "rates."

In line 2, page 2, after the word "train," insert the word "shall," and strike out the word "to."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALMON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE COAL MINERS' STRIKE.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, a great many coal mines of Michigan are located in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent. On Tuesday of this week, after consultation with the Department of Justice as to the advisability of taking this action, I issued an open letter to the striking coal miners of my congressional district. This letter was given out yesterday for publication. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a copy of that letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Michigan could not write any letter except one of the right sort, and therefore I will not object. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., November 4, 1919.

An open letter to the coal miners of Bay County, Mich.

As your Representative in Congress, prompted by a sense of duty, and after conference with the Department of Justice, I appeal to your patriotism to heed the call of your Government and return to work.

Your controversy is no longer with the mine operators. The President of the United States has declared the coal strike "unjustifiable and unlawful." Congress by a unanimous vote has pledged every resource of the Government to meet the present industrial emergency and to vindicate the majesty and power of the Government. The conspiracy of your leaders will be reviewed and passed upon by the courts. Your conduct will be judged by public opinion everywhere.

Apparently, you have entered upon this strike by reason of your affiliation with the United Mine Workers of America and not because of any serious grievance against your operators. You have had little, if anything, to do with bringing about this strike. The responsibility, nevertheless, now devolves upon you to decide whether you will support the Government which protects you and your families from aggression—or will you follow arrogant, un-American leaders who, in order to enforce their demands, are willing to paralyze transportation and industry and impose cold, hunger, and even death upon countless thousands of innocent people?

Your Government expects, and the public interest demands, that your allegiance and loyalty to the Government be acknowledged as greater than your obligation to the United Mine Workers of America or any other organization. Are you with the Government or against it? The opportunity is yours to win the confidence and respect of your fellow men by returning to duty and disavowing the dangerous leadership of those who have already brought your organization into public contempt. Your duty is clear. Show others the right course. You constitute the vast majority of Michigan coal miners, and I am honored to be your Representative in Congress. I cherish the hope that by your prompt action the Government may be advised of your return to duty and that you will not await the collapse of the strike which must inevitably come if free government is to survive.

GILBERT A. CURRIE,
Member of Congress, Tenth District, Michigan.

SETTING ASIDE PUBLIC LANDS FOR SANITARIUMS, ETC.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Public Lands I ask unanimous consent to file an amended or supplemental report on the bill H. R. 1125, on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to file a supplemental report on behalf of the Committee on the Public Lands. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman indicate something as to the circumstances under which such a request becomes necessary? Has the committee taken further action?

Mr. RAKER. It has, and gone over the matter fully.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is there no limit of time?

Mr. RAKER. I will file it to-morrow?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, what is the bill about?

Mr. RAKER. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to set aside certain public lands to be used as national sanitariums by fraternal or benevolent organizations.

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, having studied the bill somewhat, I have had difficulty in determining what it means, and I am glad to know that it has had further consideration from the committee, and I hope it has been improved.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], of course, we will enact the bill and not the report. I understand the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] wants to file a supplemental report.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The bill has not been amended in any way?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is attempting to explain the provisions of the bill?

Mr. RAKER. That will be one of the efforts.

Mr. WALSH. I trust the gentleman may be able to do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks made this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD, made this afternoon. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the conditions of unrest.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, are the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska his or are they to be interpolations from some one else?

Mr. KINKAID. They will be my own remarks, and I desire to make some quotations.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman what quotations?

Mr. KINKAID. From constituents or a constituent.

Mr. BLANTON. In Nebraska?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. I make this request because of the fact that we expect to take up an important bill from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and I think we should have a good long time in which to discuss it.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, to-morrow is claims day, and at the last claims day a bill had reached a point where the previous question had been ordered upon it. Is not that bill in order the first thing to-morrow under the rules of the House?

Mr. WINGO. If my friend will permit me, under the rules under which we are operating the Edge bill is the continuing order of the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what the gentleman proposes to do with the Edge bill, which members of the committee convinced me was one of the most important bills ever introduced into the House.

Mr. MONDELL. We expect to pass it before the end of the week. We hope to pass both these bills, and if we can meet a little earlier we can do so.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would remind the gentleman of how hopeful he is. Does the gentleman really believe we can pass the Edge bill to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is highly important that we take up this other bill, and I am in hopes that we can dispose of them both before the end of the week.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think it is about time that this House began to do some real work, and if the gentleman is going to meet early for the purpose of doing real work, I would not object to his even meeting at 10 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman from Wyoming why so important a bill as the Edge bill should be shunted about as it has been shunted about?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think it has been shunted about. We are anxious to have the bill pass——

Mr. KING. Or disposed of.

Mr. MONDELL. Or disposed of. I think it is important that we enter upon the debate of this other measure. It is a matter of great national importance. I think we can dispose of both bills in the next two days by meeting at 11 o'clock.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, since the intimidation of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] yesterday, I would be afraid to object.

Mr. CANDLER. Could the gentleman from Wyoming not give us a little time in the morning in which to pass these few claims bills that have already passed the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MONDELL. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to have them passed.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, if we are going to meet at 11 o'clock to pass claims bills, I shall object.

Mr. CANDLER. These have been reported to the House from the committee. I am not going to object to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is the bill the gentleman from Wyoming wants to take up in the morning?

Mr. MONDELL. It is a bill from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman expect that to be taken up in the morning?

Mr. MONDELL. That is the expectation.

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, I do not know about that.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, if the House does not want to take up that bill in the morning it can take up some other bill.

Mr. GARRETT. The request which came to the Committee on Rules on that matter was that there would be a resolution that would follow the Edge bill, making the bill from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries in order and certainly——

Mr. MONDELL. I am anticipating such a rule——

Mr. GARRETT. To follow the Edge bill.

Mr. MONDELL. That was not my thought. I am rather inclined to the opinion that we ought to begin to-morrow on the other bill, and I hope to pass both of them this week.

Mr. KITCHIN. How long does the gentleman really think it will take to pass the bill from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. MONDELL. I think we can pass the two bills this week.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is the bill from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries a very important bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is. It is unanimously reported by the committee, so it ought not to take a very great length of time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Not to pass an important bill it ought not? I imagine if it is a very important bill it will take more than a day or two days to consider it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The more necessity for meeting earlier.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this morning the chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries appeared before the Committee on Rules. Also the chairman of the committee investigating expenditures in the War Department. Rules were asked for by both of those chairmen. The announcement was made to the committee that it had been arranged to complete the consideration of the Edge bill, and at the conclusion of that bill a resolution from the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department would be asked for, and at the conclusion of the consideration of that resolution that the bill from the Merchant Marine and Fisheries would be asked to be considered. That statement being made, I ask the members of the Committee on Rules to meet at 11.30 to-morrow for the consideration of the resolution from the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and for the bill reported by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know who may have given the order in which these measures were to have been taken up. It was our hope that we could get through with the business to-day a little earlier so as to make some progress on the Edge bill to-day. That has not been possible, but the promise has been made to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries for a long time, that when they reported this very important measure they would be given an opportunity to get on the floor at once, and I think that if we can meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning we can dispose of both of these bills this week.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The statement of the chairman of the Committee on Rules would seem to make such a course impossible. The committee is not to meet to consider the resolution until 11.30. Would the gentleman have an earlier date for the meeting?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. MONDELL. If the Committee on Rules can not meet——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it.

Mr. MONDELL. I made that suggestion because it seemed to be a wise procedure, and, whichever bill we take up to-morrow morning, we ought to meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object again, I think as you gentlemen over there seem to be at cross purposes and confused about this matter and do not know which bill to take up, I suggest—I am not going to object—but I suggest that the majority leader wire to-night to Mr. Will Hays and find out exactly what is the wisest thing to do. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. If the House meets at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning in the absence of any special rule, what will be in order after the reading of the Journal?

The SPEAKER. There is already a special rule pending. The Chair would recognize to-morrow, if no other rule came in, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes to-morrow after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BURKE. Sure; that is a safe bet.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] objects. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. MADDEN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I think, in view of the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Rules, the program is unsettled. The majority is responsible for it, and I think we ought to give them a chance to get together, and possibly they can do it by noon to-morrow. Therefore I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, November 7, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of Commerce submitting supplemental estimate of appropriations required by the Lighthouse Service for the fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 292), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 443), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7534) granting an increase of pension to John J. Russell, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HOWARD: A bill (H. R. 10401) to amend section 14 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved April 26, 1906; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CLASSON: A bill (H. R. 10402) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant permission to the municipal authorities of Little Chute, Wis., to construct, maintain, and operate sewers on certain Government property and under the United States canal at Little Chute, Wis.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. McFADDEN: A bill (H. R. 10403) to encourage bank deposits by nonresident foreign corporations and nonresident alien individuals, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 10404) to amend sections 4, 8, and 10 of the act of June 29, 1906, as amended, relating to naturalization, to provide a division of patrol guard in the Bureau of Immigration, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. OVERSTREET: A bill (H. R. 10405) to authorize the acquisition of a site and the erection of a Federal building at Savannah, Ga.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10406) to revive the right of action under the act of March 12, 1863; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10407) for the erection of a public building at Waynesboro, Ga.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. STEENERSON: A bill (H. R. 10408) prescribing postage rates on aeroplane mail; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi: A bill (H. R. 10409) for the enlargement, extension, and improvement of the post-office building at Hattiesburg, Miss.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10410) providing for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Pascagoula, Jackson County, Miss.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HICKS: A bill (H. R. 10411) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to loan material to educational institutions; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts: Resolution (H. Res. 375) to provide for the immediate consideration of House bill 10378; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. MADDEN: Resolution (H. Res. 376) to provide for the immediate consideration of Senate bill 2867; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10426) granting a pension to Amanda E. Buck; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10427) granting a pension to Mary Reynolds; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10428) granting a pension to Hull Itskin; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10429) granting a pension to Bert M. Dorton; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of Rev. Theo Sigman and 400 others of Philadelphia, Pa., urging that the preamble of the National Constitution be amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also (by request), petition of the National Federation of Construction Industries in relation to the construction industry; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also (by request), petition of the National Federation of Construction Industries relative to Senate bill 2094; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GALLIVAN: Petition of Pere Marquette Council, of South Boston, Mass., opposing the Military Establishment taking over the welfare work in the training camps; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HARRISON: Petition of farmers and business men of Winchester, Va., pledging allegiance and support to the Government; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McGLENNON: Petition of General Custer Council, No. 130, of Newark, N. J., opposing league of nations and urging that Congress set aside the consideration of the same in order to give attention to the more important domestic affairs confronting the country at the present time; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of General Putnam Council, No. 137, of Newark, N. J., favoring the setting aside of the consideration of the league of nations until domestic matters of importance are disposed of and favoring ratification of the treaty by a referendum vote of the people; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of Lithuanian organization of Newark, N. J., concerning Lithuanian affairs; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin: Petition of Harvey Post, No. 45, Department of Wisconsin, Grand Army of the Republic, of Darlington, Wis., requesting immediate passage of the pending Fuller pension bill, House bill 8496; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SCHALL: Petition of City Council of Minneapolis, Minn., requesting Congress to fix profits on sugar and effect equitable distribution; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. VARE: Petition of Philadelphia Board of Trade, asking for the passage of the Edge bill, Senate bill 2472; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, November 7, 1919.

(Legislative day of Monday, November 3, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McCormick	Sheppard
Ball	Gronna	McCumber	Simmons
Borah	Hale	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Harding	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Calder	Harris	McNary	Smith, Md.
Capper	Harrison	Moses	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Henderson	Nelson	Smoot
Colt	Hitchcock	New	Spencer
Culberson	Johnson, Calif.	Newberry	Sutherland
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Thomas

France	La Follette	Ransdell	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Reed
Gay	Lodge	Robinson

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] is detained on official business.

Mr. GERRY. The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] are detained from the Senate by illness. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are absent on public business. I wish to announce the absence on official business of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN].

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] in attendance at a meeting of the Committee on Education and Labor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

NATIONAL FOREST RESERVATION COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in legislative session, laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, as ex officio president of the National Forest Reservation Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of the commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1919, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 681. An act to amend an act approved March 4, 1913, entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes";

S. 2494. An act to transfer the tract of land known as the Lighthouse Reservation at North Point, Md., from the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce to the jurisdiction of the War Department;

S. 2495. An act transferring the tract of land known as Craney Island from the jurisdiction of the War Department to the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department and transferring the tract of land known as Fishermans Island from the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department to the jurisdiction of the War Department; and

S. 3159. An act to authorize the State road department of the State of Florida to construct and maintain a bridge across the Choctawhatchee River, near Caryville, Fla., approximately 170 feet south of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad bridge.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1373) to amend the Articles of War, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that in accordance with the provision of the resolution (H. Con. Res. 36) for the appointment of a committee on the part of each House to represent the Congress in the ceremonies at the port of New York in commemoration of the return of the first bodies of American soldiers from the fields of the World War, the Speaker had appointed Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan, Mr. MASON, Mr. HULINGS, Mr. DOREMUS, Mr. CRISP, and Mr. SMITH of New York as the committee on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 546. An act to authorize the governor of the Territory of Hawaii to ratify the agreements of certain persons made with the commissioner of public lands of the Territory of Hawaii, and to issue land patents to those eligible under the terms of said agreements;

H. R. 3654. An act to authorize the governor of the Territory of Hawaii to acquire privately owned lands and rights of way within the boundaries of the Hawaii National Park;

H. R. 8953. An act to authorize the incorporated town of Ketchikan, Alaska, to issue bonds for the construction and equipment of schools therein, and for other purposes;

H. R. 10208. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near the city of Decatur, Ala.;

H. J. Res. 213. Joint resolution continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy; and

H. J. Res. 222. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to dispose of surplus dental outfits.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRONNA. As in legislative session I present two brief resolutions from organized railroad workers of Devils Lake, N. Dak., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEVILS LAKE LOCAL OF THE
GREAT NORTHERN SHOPS FEDERATED TRADES,
Devils Lake, N. Dak., October 31, 1919.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We, the organized railroad workers and voters of Devils Lake as a body do emphatically protest against the passage of the so-called Cummins bill for the operation of the railroads of this United States, as we believe it to be undemocratic and un-American, as we believe it to be drawn and conceived for the interest of private owners and the moneyed men and without due consideration for the rights of the public and ourselves, the railway workers: And be it further resolved that we earnestly request you to use all your influence and your vote for the defeat of the Cummins bill.

Respectfully,

CHAS. G. HARVEY,
G. W. McDONNELL,
JOHN V. HARRIS,
Resolutions Committee.

DEVILS LAKE LOCAL OF THE
GREAT NORTHERN SHOPS FEDERATED TRADES,
Devils Lake, N. Dak., October 31, 1919.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We, the members of the organized railroad workers and voters of Devils Lake, here assembled, do earnestly request you to use your influence and cast your vote for the passage of the Plumb plan for the management and operation of the railroads of the United States, as we believe this bill safeguards the interests of the owners, the public, and the workers.

Respectfully,

CHAS. G. HARVEY,
G. W. McDONNELL,
JOHN V. HARRIS,
Resolutions Committee.

Mr. DIAL. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a telegram embodying resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Upper South Carolina Conference of Churches at Greenwood, S. C.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GREENWOOD, S. C., November 6, 1919.

Hon. NATHANIEL B. DIAL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The delegates to the Upper South Carolina Conference, representing nearly 60,000 church members and about 300,000 people, are vitally interested in all that concerns our country, and has made careful study of the treaty with Germany and the league of nations constituting a part of it. We believe that if all the alleged defects in the treaty and league be admitted, yet this treaty and league are the best in settlements covering many nations and peoples that have been made in centuries; Therefore

Resolved, That without debate but with deliberate consideration, this treaty and league should be ratified without amendment or reservation and that the welfare of our country and of the world call for speediest action;

Resolved, That we respectfully request that the United States Senate ratify this, the said treaty and league;

Resolved, That the president and secretary of the conference telegraph this preamble and these resolutions to the United States Senate.

U. V. DARLINGTON, President.
W. J. SNYDER, Secretary.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Association of Ministers of Andover, Mass., praying that the United States protect Armenia from the depredations of the Turks and Kurds, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Conference of the Jewish Organizations for the Defense of the Jews in Ukrainia, held at Akron, Ohio, praying that the United States protect the Jews in Ukrainia from the depredations of the Ukrainians, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the American Legion of the State of Washington, praying that the United States take the necessary steps to safeguard the lives and property of American citizens in Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SWANSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Hampton, Va., praying for Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

FRANCIS M. ATHERTON.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2614) for the relief of Francis M. Atherton, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 288) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 3391) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for the sale of coal and asphalt deposits in the segregated mineral land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, Okla.," approved February 8, 1918 (40 Stat. L., p. 433); to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 3392) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919, to place men furloughed to the Regular Army Reserve in the same status as regards preferment in the civil service as honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DILLINGHAM:

A bill (S. 3393) for the relief of the heirs of Benjamin S. Roberts; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 3394) for the relief of Mary C. Browne; to the Committee on Claims.

NITROGEN FOR AGRICULTURAL USES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I introduce a bill which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The bill (S. 3390) to provide further for the national defense; to establish a self-sustaining Federal agency for the manufacture, production, and development of the products of atmospheric nitrogen for military, experimental, and other purposes; to provide research laboratories and experimental plants for the development of fixed-nitrogen production, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to say, Mr. President, that this bill has been drawn up by the War Department, and I am introducing it at the request of the Secretary of War. It is accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of War, addressed to myself, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, October 29, 1919.

Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR WADSWORTH: I inclose a proposed bill providing a method of conducting operations at the United States Nitrate Plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals, Ala., and authorizing the plant to turn out fixed nitrogen in available form for agricultural uses. I shall be grateful if you will introduce the bill into the Senate, where a discussion can be had upon it from both points of view, namely, first, the importance of maintaining this great enterprise as a military asset for the production of nitrogen for explosives independently of importations; and, second, the contribution which can be made to the farmers of the country by increasing the available supply of nitrogen for fertilizer.

The investment of the Government in this great plant approximates $70,000,000. In addition to that, under authority already granted by the Congress and by direction of the President, a dam is being constructed at Muscle Shoals which will incidentally improve navigation of the Tennessee River, but the primary purpose of which is the development of an immense water power to be used in connection with the fixation of nitrogen should the electrical process remain the most economical for that purpose. This investment can only be salvaged by continuing the operation of the enterprise and by improving the processes with a view to further economies and consequent reduction in price for available nitrogen for agricultural purposes. If we allow the plant to stand idle, it will not only deteriorate, but will become obsolescent, while if it can be continued in operation the forward expenditure of such additional sums as are necessary to equip steps in the development of the process can be currently installed and, should any emergency need arise, the plant will be up to date and ready for immediate use.

Because this property now belongs to the War Department, it seems wise that legislation affecting it should be introduced by the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee; but the major usefulness of the plant—practically its entire usefulness—in peace times will be to the agricultural interests of the Nation, and it is my hope that from both points of view the suggestion can receive sympathetic study.

It will be observed that the bill proposes operation by a corporation in which the Government will be the sole stockholder, rather than through one of the established bureaus of the War Department. The choice of such an instrument is dictated by the greater freedom with which the commercial and scientific undertakings of the plant can be carried on under such circumstances, and the operation of the Panama Canal Railroad is appealed to as illustrating the advantage of that form of operation in a somewhat analogous, though it seems to me more persuasive, instance.

When the bill has been introduced and referred, it will give me great pleasure to lay all the details of the present situation and such accurate forecasts as our engineers have been able to make before the committee for their consideration. The department believes that it will be possible with the outlay suggested in the bill to produce on a commercial basis recognized chemical products of high value and ready sale even prior to the completion of the dam and the installation of hydroelectric power. When that end of the project is completed an even more favorable result will be obtained and the value of the plant, particularly to the farmers, will be great and constantly growing.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

STRIKE OF COAL MINERS.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an editorial published in the Arkansas Methodist on the industrial situation.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"SUPPORT THE PRESIDENT.

"Aroused by the conspiracy of the coal miners, who had arranged to stop the production of coal on November 1, President Wilson, although still confined by weakness to his room, gave notice in unmistakable terms that the mines would be operated, if necessary, under military protection, and that those who interfered should suffer for their illegal acts. Our President deserves the full support of all red-blooded Americans in his purpose to prevent the usurpation of power by these revolutionists.

"The editor of The Nation, who is in sympathy with the steel workers, said of the strike in the steel industry: 'Thanks to the war, we stand to-day in the presence of a revolutionary force.' A correspondent of The Nation, writing of the miners' convention at which the strike resolution was passed, said that by a unanimous vote the miners demanded 'the six-hour day, the five-day week, a big increase in wages, the nationalization of the mines, the Plumb plan for the railroads, a dual alliance of mining and transportation unions, and an international alliance of coal miners,' and he further stated that this was a minimum program, and 'the convention received the chiefs of three railroad brotherhoods and cheered their explanation of the Plumb plan and their request for a politico-economic alliance of railway men and miners.'

"These things clearly reveal the revolutionary spirit of certain leaders of organized labor. They are willing to gain their ends by stopping production and transportation. They have no regard for the rights of the large portion of our people who are unorganized but must pay for all these demands. These men do not know the meaning of liberty. They are willing that farmers and others should suffer in order that they may force upon the whole American people new theories of industry. If these men and their families were starving, we might sympathize with their demands for better pay, but when we know that their pay is better than that of the vast majority who must foot the bills, our sympathy turns to the threatened public.

"It is time to make democracy safe for the world as well as to 'make the world safe for democracy'; and it is our duty loyally to support our great President when he stands for fundamental Americanism."

COLD STORAGE.

Mr. ROBINSON. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter on House bill 9521 respecting cold storage.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORT SMITH, ARK., October 31, 1919.

Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I desire to call your further attention to the proposed Federal cold-storage act which has passed the House of Representatives and is now pending in the Senate, known as H. R. 9521. You will observe on an examination of the proposed act that section 5 provides as follows:

"That if any article of food is mixed or mingled with any other article of food the dates required by section 3 of this act shall be held to be all the dates of storage of that article of food which has been in storage the longest time, and such resulting mixture or intermingled article of food shall be so marked, together with the name and location of all warehouses in which any portion of such resulting mixture or intermingled article of food is or has been stored."

If this were enacted into law it would lead to absurd results from the point of view of cracker and biscuit manufacturers, of whom I am one, as well as of many other dealers in foodstuffs. For instance, bakery products, such as biscuits and crackers, containing cold-storage lard, butter, fruit, eggs, etc., would be reported as such, although after manufacture they are never placed under refrigeration. Not a single box or package of crackers containing such ingredients could be shipped in interstate commerce unless they were in each case marked with the necessary dates, etc., based on the cold storage of lard or any other cold-storage ingredient. This would put such a burden on the manufacturer as to make it exceedingly difficult for him to do any business, and can not, so far as we can see, be of any benefit whatever to the public. If the section referred to was restricted in operation to cases where the mixture resulting from the mingling of any articles of food is thereafter placed in cold storage, so that then the dates of storage of the article of food which has been in storage the longest time, and the resulting mixture is so marked, the objection from the point of view of practicability as well as burdensomeness might be removed. I do not object to the section if it is so worded, but in its present form, and as passed by the House, it seems to me both burdensome and impracticable.

May I ask you to give the matter your attention and immediate action, as the bill in its present form will undoubtedly diminish the amount of foodstuffs available on the general market.

Yours, truly,

C. H. WORTZ,
President Fort Smith Biscuit Co.

TARIFF ON DYESTUFFS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a newspaper article bearing on the question of the tariff on dyestuffs.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK EXPERT URGES HIGH TARIFF WALL TO PROTECT AMERICAN DYE INDUSTRIES—B. C. HESSE TELLS FRANKLIN INSTITUTE THAT ACHIEVEMENTS OF UNITED STATES MANUFACTURERS AND CHEMISTS SINCE WAR BEGAN WILL COUNT FOR NOTHING UNLESS CONGRESS GUARANTEES ADEQUATE RATES OF IMPORT DUTIES AGAINST FOREIGN COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

A high tariff was urged for coal-tar dyes and also on the material for their manufacture last night at the Franklin Institute by B. C. Hesse, of New York. He pointed out that industries started since war cut off the European supply needed protection in order to become firmly established and successfully compete with the foreign importations.

"At the end of 1918," said Mr. Hesse, "after about four years of effort, our American dye industry had grown from 6,500,000 pounds of dyes in 1914, made from German intermediates, to 58,000,000 pounds of dyes made from American-made intermediates; about one-half the intermediates and about one-third the dyes required by us in 1913 were made here—an achievement of the first magnitude. Long before the war American dyemakers did make at least one dye cheaper and better than the Germans and sold it to Germans in Germany; domestic competition in one year, 1882, effected a 38 per cent decrease in the sales price of at least one dye. Beyond question, we can have dye independence if we want to pay the price, and the time to decide that is now, because we can not expect ever to have better opportunity to become independent than now.

"Dye makers contend that our dye dependence has solely been because the public refused to create favorable economic conditions. No one seems to be sure what those favorable conditions are; the dye makers are themselves undecided; in 1916 they were sure that they could give us dye independence in five years if they had nothing but 39 per cent protection on intermediates and 55 per cent on dyes. Congress gave them 39 per cent on intermediates, 30 per cent on some dyes, and 55 per cent on the remainder, and the dye makers promptly said they could not make us independent. In 1919 the dye makers twice asked for much higher rates, once without and once with imports exclusion, and finally reduced those rates somewhat and accepted a shorter exclusion period.

OUR EFFICIENCY LOWER.

"The demand for imports exclusion has merit, in so far as it is true as was only very recently confessed on behalf of the dye makers before the Committee on Ways and Means that the manufacturing technique or skill of our dye makers is only a small fraction, say, one-third or one-half of foreign manufacturing efficiency. In that event, even a 200 per cent tariff might not be effective. This was illustrated by a set of tables showing 383 dyes imported in 1913 arranged by tonnage requirements and the number of dyes in each; also the number of each tonnage class made here in 1918, together with an illustration of the protection afforded by the Longworth rates. If all an importer had to consider was the duty, clearly he would bring in those colors which were not made here, and out of this total of 383, 245 were not made here. The foreigner can deliver those 245 in good prewar quality on very short notice and at a price we could not meet.

URGES FAIR EXCLUSION.

"In four years we learned to make but 138 of these 383. With ample quantities of good qualities of those 245 dyes in Europe and just itching to get into this market of no competition and good demand, our domestic makers would be robbed of any opportunity to learn to make those 245 dyes, and before long the foreigner would have his grip on those 245 and could then commence to eat into the other 138. The dye makers say they must be assured of a remunerative market for their output, and in my opinion the only way to do that is to prevent foreign makers of qualities and kinds reaching this country in amounts greater than the difference between corresponding American deliveries and American current manufacturing requirements; price is to have nothing to do with import permission, because the dye users have for over three years taken the stand that so long as they can get quantity and quality price does not interest them seriously.

"The duration of imports exclusion should be no longer than necessary to permit domestic manufacturing skill to reach foreign levels, and this the dye makers now seem to think can be accomplished by about the end of 1921. The Longworth bill now before the Senate makes dye prices a factor in imports permission, and the speaker strongly advocated amendment of that bill eliminating this price feature, and for the reasons just given. The British Empire, France, and Italy are enforcing, or preparing to enforce, such dye and imports exclusion, thus shutting us and other makers off from 25 per cent of the non-German markets, and making our market, which is 19 per cent of the non-German markets, more than ever a target for all. Under these conditions, and in the absence of a flexibly applicable defensive measure, such as imports exclusion, our industry can not hope to survive."

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico:

H. R. 546. An act to authorize the governor of the Territory of Hawaii to ratify the agreements of certain persons made with the commissioner of public lands of the Territory of Hawaii, and to issue land patents to those eligible under the terms of said agreements; and

H. R. 3654. An act to authorize the governor of the Territory of Hawaii to acquire privately owned lands and rights of way within the boundaries of the Hawaii National Park.

H. R. 8953. An act to authorize the incorporated town of Ketchikan, Alaska, to issue bonds for the construction and equipment of schools therein, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Territories.

H. R. 10208. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near the city of Decatur, Ala., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. J. Res. 213. Joint resolution continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ELECTIONS IN MASSACHUSETTS AND NEW JERSEY.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I was very much impressed in reading the newspapers the last two or three days in seeing a copy of a telegram from the President of the United States dispatched to Gov. Coolidge, the successful nominee for the governorship of the great State of Massachusetts. I feel that this evidence of nonpartisanship and broad-minded viewpoint is of sufficient importance that it should be given a place in the RECORD. The telegram reads as follows:

To Gov. COOLIDGE:

I congratulate you upon your election as a victory for law and order. When law is the issue, all Americans stand together.

WOODROW WILSON.

In order that the picture may be complete I think it no more than just that a similar telegram dispatched a day later to the successful Democratic nominee for governor of the State of New Jersey should likewise be inserted in the RECORD. That telegram read:

To Mr. EDWARDS:

Please accept my hearty congratulations upon your election.

WOODROW WILSON.

It has been clearly established, I think, throughout the Nation that the principle involved in the contest in Massachusetts, as the President very properly repeats, was a contest for law and order.

Inasmuch, perhaps, as the principles involved in the contest in New Jersey may not have been as clearly established throughout the country, I desire, by unanimous consent, to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a brief extract from the platform of the Democratic Party in the State of New Jersey, upon which platform Mr. Edwards conducted his campaign:

We believe in the personal liberty of the individual and are opposed to legislative encroachments thereon. We reiterate our declaration of past years, that the question of prohibition has no proper place in the fundamental law of the Nation. We pledge ourselves to oppose, by all lawful means, the ratification or enforcement of the so-called prohibition amendment to the Federal Constitution, and to lead the movement which will eventually result in its repeal.

A resolution adopted at the same convention and acquiesced in by the candidate reads as follows:

That the league of nations covenant should not be approved without giving recognition to the Irish Republic.

I now quote from a declaration which was frequently made by the candidate for governor in speeches throughout the State of New Jersey:

If I am elected governor, I will make New Jersey as wet as the Atlantic Ocean.

I simply wanted to have in the RECORD these two viewpoints. The President has boasted of having a single-track mind. In my opinion, he does himself an injustice. He approves of law and order on the one hand, and contradicts on the other his modest self-description.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] has stated that the President has a single-track mind. I would to God the Senate had a single-track mind, so that it could keep on one track long enough to dispose of this treaty one way or the other, instead of playing politics.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question, with his permission. As I recall the plank which the Senator from New Jersey claimed was in the Democratic platform, it was an affirmation of the belief in the rights of individuals, a declaration against the growing usurpations of the Federal Government. I think that was the idea. Does not the Senator from New Jersey sympathize with the time-honored principle accepted by Democrats, and, I think, accepted by many Republicans, that this is a land of liberty, a land in which personal rights should receive recognition? The Senator certainly can not inveigh against that declaration of the platform.

Mr. EDGE. I shall be glad to reply to the query of the Senator from Utah. I do sympathize very emphatically with the idea of personal liberty, but I do not sympathize with—and I will draw attention again to it, for I think it possibly went over the heads of Senators—this specific statement of the platform to which I have referred:

We pledge ourselves to oppose, by all lawful means, the ratification or enforcement—of the so-called prohibition amendment.

The enforcement—

I do not sympathize with opposition to the enforcement of any part of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the telegrams and extracts to which I have referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Copies of telegrams.]

To Gov. COOLIDGE:

I congratulate you upon your election as a victory for law and order. When law is the issue, all Americans stand together.

WOODROW WILSON.

To Mr. EDWARDS:

Please accept my hearty congratulations upon your election.

WOODROW WILSON.

[Extracts from platform and resolutions adopted by the Democratic State convention in New Jersey, Sept. 30, 1919, upon which platform Mr. Edwards ran for governor.]

We believe in the personal liberty of the individual and are opposed to legislative encroachments thereon. We reiterate our declaration of past years, that the question of prohibition has no proper place in the fundamental law of the Nation. We pledge ourselves to oppose, by all lawful means, the ratification or enforcement of the so-called prohibition amendment to the Federal Constitution, and to lead the movement which will eventually result in its repeal.

[Quotation from speeches of Democratic candidate for governor of New Jersey.]

If I am elected governor I will make New Jersey as wet as the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in view of the reference by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] to the recent election in Massachusetts, I can not permit the opportunity to pass without expressing my deep personal gratification not only with the result but with the overwhelming vote sustaining the policy and indorsing the courageous action of the governor of Massachusetts during the recent strike of the Boston police force. I regarded that campaign from its inception, especially when the issue was made between the two parties involving the fundamental American question, Shall an executive in the fearless discharge of his duty and through the enforcement of the laws which he has sworn to execute be sustained by the popular approval of his countrymen?

Mr. President, that election will have a wholesome and very desirable influence all over the United States, including Members of the Congress, for one of its lessons is that popular approval attends the honest and conscientious discharge of public duty, and that the way to remain in public service is to perform public duties, regardless of consequences.

The labor vote of the United States, like that of other classes, Mr. President, is at heart wholesome, sound, and American. It always so expresses itself when that expression can be had with impunity. The secret ballot supplies that impunity. I therefore emphasize the simple truth that performance of duty is the open sesame to continuance in public favor.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the pending question is the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the first reservation, which, in fact, is the preamble of the reservations reported by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on behalf of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The reservation as reported reads as follows:

1. The reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate are to be made a part and a condition of the resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of said resolution of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

If the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is adopted, the reservation will then read as follows:

The reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate are to be made a part and a condition of the resolution of ratification.

In my opinion the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota should be agreed to.

The preamble as proposed not only makes the reservations and understandings a part and a condition of the resolution of ratification, but it provides that the ratification shall not bind the United States until these reservations have been accepted by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, namely, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

If the amendment is agreed to, the preamble will merely make the reservations a part and a condition of the resolution of ratification.

If Senators in ratifying the treaty insist that reservations are necessary in order that the construction placed by this Government upon the treaty may be made clear, and in order that this Government may be relieved from complications which they assert are likely to result without reservations, why should we require the express acceptance of constructions which other nations may regard obnoxious as to themselves, even if they should be willing to acquiesce in such constructions as to this Government? Undoubtedly the requirement that these reservations must be expressly accepted by at least three of the principal allied and associated powers before ratification by the United States shall become effective originates in opposition to the treaty rather than in a desire to improve it.

Singling out the principal allied and associated powers from other nations party to the treaty, the insistence that three of these shall accept the reservations as a part and condition of the instrument of ratification before the ratification shall become effective will probably prove offensive to the remainder of the 32 nations signing the treaty.

What is the purpose of this very peculiar, almost unprecedented provision? Does it mean that we merely desire to form an alliance with three of the principal allied and associated powers by refusing to ratify the treaty except upon conditions that must prove repugnant to many nations, including some of our recent allies?

Is there a purpose to so word the resolution of ratification as to prevent Japan from acceding to it?

Notwithstanding the unusual and, in my opinion, unnecessarily offensive character of this provision as respects our relations with other nations, no explanation or justification of it has been offered to the Senate.

If the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is not agreed to and the reservation is adopted and is incorporated in the resolution of ratification, what will be the result if three of the principal allied and associated powers accept the reservations as part and condition of the instrument of ratification? What will be our relation to the other allied and associated powers who have not accepted it, and what will be our relation to other nations who have signed the treaty but who decline to recognize the reservations made by this Government? Suppose Brazil, for instance, should take offense at the reservation respecting the Monroe doctrine, which denies to any nation other than the United States any right to interpret the Monroe doctrine and which arrogantly declares in the United States alone the right to interpret that doctrine; suppose that every other nation in the Western Hemisphere should array itself commercially against this Government for thus assuming a position of open and express antagonism toward them in the assertion of the right to safeguard and protect their territory for the preservation of our own safety. Would not such result be the natural or probable consequence of this preamble coupled with the reservation regarding the Monroe doctrine? Do not all Senators know that already a feeling of resentment exists among the peoples of Central and South America toward the United States for what they believe our assumption and assertion of superiority and the right of domination over them? Why stimulate that resentment? In making a treaty of peace we ought not to fan smoldering embers of international prejudice. We ought not deliberately to invite suspicion and unfriendliness from other nations. We ought not to repel or incense our recent allies. We ought not to invite needless antagonism toward the United States. That is exactly what this reservation seems to me to accomplish. It is both unnecessary and injurious. It promises no useful or beneficial result; it will work harm and is a poorly concealed effort indirectly to accomplish what the avowed opponents of the treaty are unable to do, namely, to defeat the treaty.

Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] will still leave in the reservation all that the reasonable advocates of reservations to this treaty may fairly hope to accomplish. The defeat of the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota will leave this reservation so objectionable to many of the nations signing the treaty that in all probability the ratification may never become effective.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall support the majority of the reservations that are now submitted to the Senate. A number of them are similar to reservations I submitted several weeks ago. I desire to see the treaty ratified with reservations to clarify the meaning, to supply a mode of action where the treaty is silent, and to modify article 10.

At first I thought it necessary for them to formally accept, but I have reached the conclusion that it is not necessary, and that we will hinder rather than promote the operation of the treaty with proper reservations if we require formal acceptance.

These reservations do not in any way deal with the German treaty. Why should we require three of the principal allies to accept reservations which we make limiting the authority of our representatives in the league, and defining the way in which we will quit the league? Why should we make formal acceptance by three of these nations necessary to complete our acceptance of the treaty with Germany when those reservations only affect our relations to the league?

I do not consider that these reservations affect the treaty with Germany at all. They might not be formally accepted by three of these nations. Then we have not closed our treaty of peace with Germany. If we adopt the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, the nations associated with us will be notified of our action. They can decline to let us enter the league of nations if they see fit. They can say: "We will not acquiesce in your limited membership. We will not concede to you membership in the league of nations with the reservations you have made." But we will have ratified the treaty with Germany despite that action upon their part.

Now, Mr. President, take the second reservation. I expect to support the second reservation. One of the provisions in that reservation is the statement as to how we will get out of the league. Our associates have nothing to do with our mode of giving the notice of retirement. It provides that the United States may withdraw by a concurrent resolution of Congress. I am cordially in favor of that mode of withdrawal. I believe one of the most valuable things the Senate can do to-day is to help bring the country back to congressional responsibility. During the war many with the best of purposes transferred practically all the responsibility of Congress to the administration. Some of these measures I sought to check. I am very much in favor of the provision that notice can be given by a concurrent resolution of Congress. Our associates, the three nations required to acquiesce, have nothing to do with that. That is an issue, perhaps, between congressional and administrative authority.

I pick a day in the future. Suppose, two years hence, we desire to withdraw. I take a time when we do not know who will be President. What part of the Government is nearest to the people? The House of Representatives and the Senate. How would we determine to withdraw? I am unwilling to leave the withdrawal to the action of the one man in Switzerland. I am unwilling to leave it to him under the suggestion of the Secretary of State at home. I am unwilling to have it stopped. If Congress desires us to withdraw, even because the President did not approve it. If the majority of each branch of Congress favors withdrawal, I desire to see the notice given for the withdrawal.

But what have our associates in the war to do with that? Why should we ask them to accept that plan? They have nothing to do with it. We make it a part of the condition of ratification so as to make it sure that such a notice by Congress would be effective, but they have nothing to do with it. It might embarrass them to be called on expressly to approve such a course.

Now take reservation No. 4. I am very thoroughly in favor of that reservation. Without some such reservation, I would not wish to see the treaty approved:

> No mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, Part I, or any other provision of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. KING. Speaking for myself, I should dislike to have the United States accept any mandate without the consent of Congress. Indeed, with my present view, I should dislike to see the United States, at least for the present, accept any mandate. But does the Senator think—and I am asking this question for the purpose of obtaining his view—that a proper construction of the treaty would require the United States to accept a mandate from the council or from any other body except by the consent of the Government itself? When I say "the Government itself," that, of course, would mean the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know, and I want to know before the treaty is ratified.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to know that it can not be done except with the approval of Congress. I think a President ought not to undertake to accept it without the action of Congress; but Presidents do not always respect the authority of Congress. They sometimes assume authority which I consider congressional.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was just going to ask the Senator if he does not think this treaty is framed on the theory that whenever our member of the council gives his assent to a decision it is the binding act of the representative of this Government, and binds the Government to follow out that decision?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am afraid it does.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what the provision of the treaty is which binds this Nation by the act of our member of the council, if he has not been given any authority by the Congress?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is not anything in it about Congress giving him authority. The whole spirit of the covenant is based upon the idea that the treaty gives him his authority, and that his power comes from ratification of the treaty. I do not mean to say that I would construe it myself as giving him the authority, but I do say it is not clear; and, as the Senator from Washington remarked, the spirit of the covenant is to have the representative of each country in the council speak for the country.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one word more. I realize the fact that the other countries involved are countries in which the legislative branch is not, as a rule, required to act. Take the representative of Great Britain. Parliament is not obliged to act. It can be done through the minister of State for foreign affairs, or the prime minister, and their representatives act under their direction. When we realize that this covenant was drawn primarily by Gen. Smuts, we must take with it the thought that provision has not been made requiring formal approval of the action of the representative of the council from his home.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, article 22, in referring to the tutelage of these peoples, says:

> That the tutelage of such peoples should be entrusted to advanced nations who by reason of their resources, their experience, or their geographical position can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it.

I do not understand that a member of the council would have any more authority to accept it than an ambassador would have a right to accept it under the treaty, without some special legal authority given to him.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I would like to ask the Senator from Ohio who would do it? Would it be the President or the Congress?

Mr. POMERENE. The law-making power would do it.

Mr. KELLOGG. It does not say so.

Mr. POMERENE. I know it does not say so; but there is not anyone else who has the authority to bind the United States.

Mr. REED. Why not, then, write it in and make it perfectly plain?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. I have yielded to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. It seems to me if that is true—and it certainly ought to be true—we ought to make it distinct and plain that Congress is the power that must accept such a mandate.

Mr. POMERENE. It is perfectly plain, to my mind, at least, that a member of the council has no authority whatsoever in this behalf. There are certain provisions which are not as clear as they ought to be, and questions will be constantly coming up; but I do not think there is anything needed to add clarity to this particular provision.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have often heard the Senator from Georgia express himself to the effect that the only way the Nation should properly act is through its Congress. I desire to suggest to the Senator, as it is the Nation that is to consent, as it is the Nation that must be willing to do so, it seems to me that we must construe it that the only way the Nation can express its willingness or its consent is by act of its legislative body, by a joint resolution, or an act of that character, signed, of course, by the President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Reenforcing the suggestions which have been made, I desire to invite attention again to the language of the covenant quoted by the Senator from Ohio:

> The tutelage of such peoples should be intrusted to advanced nations who by reason of their resources, their experience, or their geographical position can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it.

That is to say, the Nation is willing to accept it. Mr. President, who can contend that the representative of the Nation on the council is the Nation? That would be absurd. Moreover, Mr. President, the representative upon the council acts in tendering the mandate; but that is not all that is necessary. The Nation must be willing to accept it, because the act must be unanimous, and of course our representative there must acquiesce in the invitation or in the suggestion. Accordingly there would be no significance at all to the language if we would not accept it.

Let me answer the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. Why should we put in the covenant the particular method under which, by our system of government, assent should be given, any more than there should go into the covenant the particular method by which the assent of the nation of Great Britain should be expressed, or the assent of the Republic of France, or the assent of the Kingdom of Italy? Why in the covenant should we go into specific provisions concerning these matters? The Government of the United States, the Nation of the United States, will express its assent pursuant to its peculiar Constitution. The Republic of France——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can answer the Senator, if he is through with the question, and then I wish to proceed a little further without interruption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish an express declaration, because, taking this covenant as a whole, there seems to be a confused idea on the part of its authors as to who is to act for a nation. I gather from a number of places in the covenant that the representative in the council is to act for his nation. This would no doubt be the case for Great Britain, and he would act under instruction from the home office. I wish no doubt about the limitation of authority of our representative to congressional action. I have, of course, read, and was entirely familiar with, the exact language of article 22, and indeed had underscored the language "who are willing to accept." Who shall act for the Nation? If you will read the interview between the Foreign Relations Committee and the President, you will see that the President suggested that our representative in Switzerland would, of course, be in touch with the administration here, so that it could control his actions. I want something more. Where the vital interests of my country are involved, I do not wish the President to act upon matters of this kind, and I do not wish too much power given to a President, let us say two years hence, in order that it may be in no sense personal. I do not wish too much power given two years hence to a President to dominate our affairs through this council without congressional approval.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We have entered into innumerable treaties with various Governments under which our Government undertook to do certain things. Those treaties never specified how our Government was to do those things, through what agencies it was to do them. For instance, treaties often require the appointment of commissions. They do not specify that those commissioners shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. They do not provide that those commissioners shall be appointed by a vote of both Houses in joint session or by the concurrent action of both Houses. In every instance it is left to the machinery of the Government, and it would be recognized as being in the nature of an impertinence upon the part, for instance, of Great Britain——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I merely yielded for a question, and I would rather make my own argument and let the Senator make his in his own time. I am opposed to the President sending commissioners to act under this treaty without submitting their nominations to the Senate. I do not wish this treaty ratified without limitations that will preserve the control by Congress. I do not wish to take the chances of any representative in Switzerland, with the approval of the President, putting a mandate on this country. I will not say I would vote against the treaty without this proviso, but I will not say that I will vote for it. I am earnestly for proviso No. 4.

Let us think about that a moment and see what confronts us to-day with reference to mandates. We almost accepted charge of Armenia without waiting for the treaty to be ratified.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator if it is not the best information he has that a pledge has already been made that we will acept the mandate of Armenia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know. I do not know just what has been going on, and I have not found anybody who could tell me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What consequences would attach to it if any such pledge had been given, or what significance would it have?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This consequence, that it would be an indication of the interpretation of this covenant by those who helped make it and those now in authority that pledges could be made in that way—that action of Congress was not necessary to accept a mandate. If a mandate should be accepted without submitting the question to Congress, it would be most embarrassing. Troops might be sent abroad to execute the mandate even before the public was informed of the action.

Let us go a little further with reference to this mandate that many are insisting we should receive. What is it? No one has been more enlisted in behalf of the Armenians than myself, and I have hoped that it might be practically possible for the United States to reach into Turkey and help save them. But what do we now learn? That they have not a local territory; that they are scattered; and instead of accepting the mandate for the Armenians, we must accept a mandate for the Ottoman Empire. And then what are we frankly told? The most conservative say we must put a hundred thousand men in Asia Minor for the next 10 years to execute the mandate.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. I ask the Senator if he has seen the estimate that it would cost the United States a billion dollars, and that it would involve the use of 50,000 men over a period of 20 years, to consummate the pacification and reorganization of that area of the Turkish Empire which it is proposed shall be given to the United States under a mandate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Furthermore, it has been suggested that a certain very distinguished member of the banking house of J. Pierpont Morgan should be made viceroy of Constantinople. Furthermore, the Senator doubtless knows that an oil pool——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am willing to yield to the Senator for a question, but I would rather not yield further than that, because I wish to supplement my suggestion just made with another. The most conservative estimate I have seen has been that it would require a hundred thousand men to handle the Turkish Empire, but——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me finish this sentence. But the report as published from our military officers who have been studying the question is it would require that 250,000 men be kept in Turkey.

Mr. POMERENE. I was just wondering who this wonderful seer was who could look 20 years into the future and give us reliable information as to the extent of the Army and the amount of resources it would take to maintain conditions there.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not myself refer to a seer looking 20 years hence. I am sure no one could insure that so small a number would be sufficient. I referred to the military officers who have represented the Government in the investigation of conditions in Asia Minor, who have reported, so the press dispatches state, that it would take 250,000 men.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; for a question, not for a speech. I am not going to yield to anyone for a speech.

Mr. REED. I simply want to ask a question in this way: If, as the Senator from Ohio intimates, there is no seer who can look into the future and tell how many men it will take, are we not engaged in the very dangerous operation of taking a leap in the dark, when nobody, no prophet, even, can tell where we are going to land?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand there are probably more than 75,000,000 Mussulmen in the world, and when we take charge of the Turkish Empire in Asia how many of them may come from other sections and rally to the support of their brethren nobody knows.

A week or 10 days ago a distinguished writer, who was warmly in favor of our taking charge of the Turkish Empire, accepting the mandate, estimated that only a hundred thousand men would be necessary. Nobody knows. Our Army officers think it would be safe to undertake it with 250,000 men in Asia Minor. Whether they may be attacked by overwhelming numbers and cut to pieces nobody knows. How many men and how much money would be required is uncertain.

I am not prepared just at the present time to vote to accept a mandate for the Turkish Empire, and while I am in the Senate I do not wish to see a treaty made that will allow anyone to accept it without giving me a chance to vote before the acceptance takes place. I shall support No. 4 of the provisos with the feeling that I am only taking a fair precaution to save my country unspeakable embarrassment and to save the boys whose lives would be lost in Asia if 250,000 were sent there and kept there, perhaps for 10 years, at least for an indefinite time.

Of course, if we get into it, if we put 250,000 boys there and start the job, Uncle Sam will not back out. We might have to cut our way out; but we do not want to send them there to back out. If it took 250,000 more, in event the first 250,000 were put there, we would stand up and carry the job through.

Now, I am unwilling, under the advice of any one man in Switzerland, even though he speak two years hence by the advice of the man who then may be President, to have the first 250,000 sent there and the task begun unless, after the fullest discussion in Congress and the fullest consideration of the subject by the people of our entire country, our people are ready to make the sacrifice.

Whose sacrifice will it be? Perhaps not that of any Senator. We may not have any boys who will be called in the draft and sent to Asia to die by disease or by the scimitar of the Turks. They may be somebody else's boys, not ours, but I am not willing to put that task upon somebody else's boy, or to allow anybody else to put it upon somebody else's boy, or to vote for a treaty that might let somebody else put it upon somebody else's boy, until Congress, in touch with the people, after the fullest consideration and after the wishes of the people of the country are learned, determines that it is a task we must undertake.

I am intensely in favor of the fourth reservation. But that is a matter for our domestic control. Who shall pass upon it is not a question for the governments associated with us in the war, and that is one of the reasons why I am going to support the reservation of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I do not want to require that other countries shall give their formal approval to the manner in which we will carry our responsibility here at home.

The papers are saying that this is a great struggle between extending power in the administration or in the Congress, that there has been a long struggle for 100 years between the White House and the Congress as to the respective powers of each, and that these provisions of the treaty, these provisions retaining the power in Congress and requiring congressional approval before action, are part of a 100-year struggle between the executive and the legislative.

Mr. President, the legislative, so far as I know, has never encroached upon the executive in the United States; I think I might say during even the last 10 years occasionally the executive has disregarded the constitutional responsibility of the legislative branch of the Government. I put it that far back because it prevents my suggestion from having any personal aspect. I say within the past 10 years the constitutional responsibility of Congress has not always been respected.

I am opposed to encroachment by any Executive upon the power of the legislative branch of the Government. I believe the legislative branch of the Government was meant to speak for the people and the States, and that no part of our constitutional system contemplates imperialism or dictatorship. This is a question that rises far above party. It is our country, our Constitution, I would help save the opportunity for our people to live safeguarded by its provisions.

I shall support the fifth paragraph of the reservations. I am intensely against having any question as to who is to pass upon our domestic problems, and at once I put my finger upon the domestic problem of chief importance—immigration. I believe, as the covenant is written, questions of immigration could be forced into arbitration and consideration by the council.

This is not the first time I have had the opportunity of discussing this question before the Senate. In 1912, just after I reached this body, the treaty with England was before the Senate, and then it was that the other side of the Chamber had the majority and we were in the minority. Some of the leaders on the other side wished to accept that treaty with terms that required arbitration, perhaps, of our domestic problems; but former Senator Bacon, of Georgia, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] joined hands in passing reservations to that treaty which made the ratification conditional upon the reservation of our domestic problems, and immigration by name, from arbitration of any kind.

I have not changed my views since then, and I am not desirous of seeing this treaty ratified without a fair and explicit declaration that we do not intend to submit any of our domestic problems to arbitration. I am glad to have immigration named as one of the domestic problems that no one man, no set of men, no nation, no set of nations shall arbitrate for us.

I am not only opposed to oriental immigration, but I do not care for gentlemen's agreements about it. I believe in saying frankly that we know that two such dissimilar races can not live in equal numbers side by side with equality without conflict; that no such races can intermarry with propriety and raise a homogeneous race that can live side by side in peace on a basis of equality, with substantial numerical equality.

If we have solved the question in my State, it has been with more or less friction, and due to the fact that the great body of our colored race are willing to accept the views of the white race. But that would be impossible in California with the Japanese. I am opposed to any kind of a provision in the treaty which will develop friction between us and the other members of the league, which leaves language uncertain, inviting dispute, inviting disputes that will lead to war and make it not a league for peace but a league with provisions calculated to produce war.

I am unwilling that the United States should go in the league, except with a complete reservation of domestic problems. It is said that is what the covenant means now. Perhaps it does, perhaps it does not. Let us not go into it without expressly declaring our construction of its meaning and without making that the condition of our going into it. But we really do not need any formal agreement from our associates on that subject. If we make that a condition of our ratification, it stands, and unless they agree to it we are not in the league of nations at all. I am willing to carry our part of the burden in the league if we so frame the language that it does not put unnecessary and unwise burdens on us. I am willing to go if we do not go with language so uncertain, so indefinite, so calculated to cause dispute that it is more likely to involve us in war than to aid us in preserving peace.

I passed over one of the reservations. It was the second reservation having reference to article 10. I am in favor of that reservation. I am opposed to placing any moral obligation upon the United States requiring us to enter war. That article 10 plans this obligation and meant to plan the obligation is proven by the language found in the latter half of the article, which declares that the council shall advise each nation as to the number of troops that should be furnished to meet its obligation. Now, just let us see what would be our situation to-day if the league with article 10 had been adopted and were in full force to preserve against external aggression the territory and the government of a threatened nation. Is there a member of the league now already invaded, with its territory in jeopardy, and its Government in a questionable condition on account of the invasion? Undoubtedly there is. One of the members of the league is Hedjaz, in Arabia or Asia Minor, I am not sure which, for I have not been able to find a map with that country marked on it. It is along in the "twilight zone" between the two.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. SMOOT. It is in Arabia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It surrounds the holy city of Mecca. We are advised by the associated press dispatches that two-thirds of the Arabian tribes have combined, have marched upon Hedjaz, and have captured one-half of the territory of Hedjaz. I do not know how much that is. The telegram did not explain which half it was, but they have captured a part of the territory of Hedjaz; and the telegrams say they are even threatening the holy city of Mecca. There is not any doubt about the duty of the council under the league. With article 10 in full force and the covenant ratified, they must advise at once the number of troops each country must furnish, and we would be pledged in advance to send our soldiers to defend Hedjaz.

I do not know how many of these Arabians there are. We would not know how to declare war against them unless we declared war against bands of Arabians. Indeed, we would not have to declare war against them. Our duty would be, under the advice of the council, to send our part of the troops to Hedjaz to drive off the Arabians and to save our colleague in the league, Hedjaz. Well, those Arabs are a pretty warlike people; there may be several hundred thousand of them, and it might require an army of 200,000 men. The council might say that the United States ought to furnish 50,000 of such an army. I am not sure that it would take an act of Congress, under the league, to send those troops. It would take an act of Congress to declare war, but we would not have to declare war; we would not have to go into war. All we would have to do would be to help drive the Arabs off the soil of Hedjaz. I repeat, it might take 200,000 men to do it, our pro rata might be 50,000, and the President of the United States in performing his duty might send them without waiting for Congress to act. Ordinarily the President would be restrained by the need of an appropriation, but in latter days we merely turn the Treasury over and do not distribute the funds ourselves.

In the debate a few days ago it was suggested that the President did not have the power to use the Army in the United States to preserve peace. I have no doubt about his having that right inside the United States. I think it is the duty of the President to use the troops in the United States to suppress lawlessness, to back up the State authorities whenever troops are required to preserve law and order, and to suppress even the most incipient insurrection. Under the terms of the league would not this invasion of Hedjaz be a piece of lawlessness on the part of the Arabs? Would not our responsibility extend beyond the bounds of the United States, under this covenant, to all the countries of the league, and does not the responsibility attach of preserving order at least against external aggression endangering the preservation of the territorial boundaries of members of the league and could not the President act? May not a President five years from now, when some country like Hedjaz, a member of the league, is endangered, with a lofty spirit of altruism, with a real love for the universe—and the farther it is off from his own country the greater the love—feel called upon to send our boys to drive Arabs away from Hedjaz or some other similar place?

I am opposed to article 10. I am in favor of qualifying it with the express statement that we will accept no responsibility under it, and that each occasion for the use of aid by the United States shall come to the Congress, with no moral obligation created by a prior treaty, but with Congress free to exercise judgment in each instance as it arises, and with no power in a President to send troops abroad until Congress authorizes their being sent.

I am utterly opposed to an indefinite prior obligation applying almost to the universe.

Under article 10 as it is written, if the Chinese should rise in strength sufficient to jeopardize the holding of Shantung by Japan, if I voted for article 10, I would vote, then, in good faith, living up to my pledge, to send American boys to Shantung to help the Japs whip the Chinamen; but I am not going to vote for article 10, so I am not going to be embarrassed by that future obligation; and I have no fear that article 10 will be made a part of this treaty ratified by the Senate of the United States.

Suppose from Siberia, sympathizing with the Koreans, there should be a movement that might jeopardize the holding of Korea by the Japs; if article 10 stays without limitation in this covenant, we must send our boys to help the Japs hold Korea. Again, suppose the Arabian tribes should join their fellow religionists in Egypt and jeopardize the holding of Egypt by Great Britain; under article 10 whatever is necessary of blood from the boys of the United States must be spilled to help Great Britain dominate Egypt.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, does not the Senator recognize the element of mutuality or common obligation in article 10? Suppose Mexico should invade the United States for purposes of conquest, does not the Senator perceive that it would be the duty of Japan in that case to send Japanese boys over here in order to defend the United States against such an instance of external aggression?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I thank the Senator for the suggestion; and whenever we get where we need Japan to help defend us against Mexico, then I want to adopt section 10, but not before.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator recognizes that what is true of Mexico may be also true of Nicaragua and of Colombia and of Paraguay and of Uruguay and of other countries?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; that is a serious problem, and I enjoy with the Senator from Colorado the humor with which he mentions it.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, I was very serious in making the suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It will be difficult for the Senator ever to persuade anybody that he was serious.

I only wish to call attention to the manner in which we may be embroiled by article 10. I am aware of the fact that the advocates of this article present it as a panacea for all war. The league advocates are of two classes: One class want a superconstitution, a supergovernment, and want it as strong as the Constitution of the United States, and assert with that kind of a government war would be impossible. Why, Senators, even the Constitution of the United States did not make war among the States impossible. No kind of constitution in the shape of a league of nations can make war between the members of the league impossible. We had the Holy Alliance; we had the league of peace, more powerful relatively to the remainder of the world than this proposed league, composed of England, France, Germany, Austria, and Russia. The difficulty was that they were still all human, and, being human, they could not divide the plunder to suit each other, and they got to fighting over it amongst themselves. I am utterly opposed to any kind of a league of nations that has a constitution with the power of physical force.

I sent the reservations I prepared to a very splendid preacher in Georgia, who wrote back and said, "I object to them; they take the power of force out of the covenant and the league. Point to me where you have left any power of force." I wrote back and said, "Point to me any place where I have not cut it out and I will prepare a new reservation."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator did that, what would become of the "league to enforce peace"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The league can be, I think, of real value without resorting to physical force.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My question is, How will you have a "league to enforce peace" if you have no force?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am answering the Senator, but I can not answer in just a word. You must let me elaborate. When the President accepted the degree conferred by the University of Paris he discussed the league of nations, and he announced the character of league which he favored, and that is the character of league which I favor now. He said it was a league by moral force, by the discussion of right and wrong, by the presentation of truth that would reach and adjust differences. I am in favor of a league where conferences would be had and disputes adjusted and frequently, I trust, by the use of moral force, a resort to physical force be avoided.

I believe nations are very much like men and almost like boys. We all remember in our younger days how often two boys would be on the point of a personal difficulty and neither knew how to stop. Both wanted to stop, or at least were willing to stop, but unless somebody came in and said, "Hold on, boys; talk it over; let us see if we can not adjust it," they would fight. I believe that an organized association of the nations of the world, the nations to be in this league, without any power of physical force, without any prior obligation to resort to physical force, which I think is a menace to peace, can adjust and stop many of the differences and wars that might otherwise come upon the world.

I have gone farther than I meant to go. I really only intended to say a few words in support of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and my desire to see the treaty with Germany a closed incident. My belief that a number of the reservations that I am for concern our domestic policy, and that it might be embarrassing to ask these other nations to approve them, and yet I am intensely in favor of having them in the reservations, leads me to feel that the better way is not to require a formal approval, but if we go on in the league without objections that is an approval that would be binding, and, so far as I am concerned, whenever they do not want us on those terms let the treaty with Germany stand and we will quit the league. If they are not satisfied and question our terms, we will come out of the league, but let the peace with Germany stand under the treaty.

I certainly think that the second reservation ought to be adopted.

When the constitution of the league first got to us there was no way provided for secession, and we were asked, first, to believe that the right of secession existed without any provision at all on the subject. Well, there were several States around where I live that thought so in 1861. I am not prepared to say, passing upon the Constitution as a cold constitutional question, that I would not think so, too, now—I mean, if it had not been settled. There was only one way for us to settle it, and that was done. Now, secession from this league—with no provision given for secession, with the suggestion that, of course, the right existed—was a singular act for a man who had lived in the United States and was familiar with the history of the United States. We had learned that was a condition to cause bloodshed and war; and yet here was a league to spare the world from any war in the future; we were to enter to prevent the possibility of war, left exactly in the condition that our Constitution was left, which brought on a four-year war among the States of the Union.

I am thoroughly in favor of an express declaration that the United States alone will pass upon the question as to whether the United States has performed its obligations under the covenant in case it gives a notice to withdraw. The covenant is silent on that subject. There is no right to insist that one nation, without such a provision, could pass upon the question for itself. Where is the right? Where is a line in the covenant that justifies the opinion that each nation shall itself pass upon the performance of its obligations if it gave a notice to retire? Not a word. The covenant simply says that each nation can withdraw on a two years' notice if it has complied with its obligations. Who determines it? The covenant is absolutely silent, leaving room for dispute, leaving room for a dispute that might bring on war. I think the provision should be that each country—not only ours, but that any country—should have the right to decide for itself. I would go that far; but I want it stated definitely that we can decide for ourselves if we wish to leave the league; and then, furthermore, I heartily approve the provision that the notice can be given by a concurrent resolution of Congress.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Will the Senator kindly enlighten us as to why he should select the phrase "concurrent resolution" instead of "joint resolution" or "act of Congress"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why, unquestionably. I do not want a President to have a right to stop it, and compel a two-thirds vote of Congress to put it through. That is why.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Suppose, for instance, that we wished to withdraw. It would not be necessary, unless you should assume that there would be a veto power exercised, to have a two-thirds vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If you said it should be done by a joint resolution, a joint resolution only becomes effective with the approval of the President.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I appreciate that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And if the President did not approve withdrawal, then it would come back to Congress, and you would have to pass it over his veto, or we could not withdraw. As I said at the outset, I am opposed to letting one man in Switzerland, or one man in the White House, control our action in this matter.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator this further question: Then should we not modify our Constitution to correspond with that view, so as to take away from the President the veto power on all matters, and allow them to be determined by the Congress of the United States by a majority vote?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that is a very different question. Here, we are about to go into a novel project, into an association with nations where we will be represented 3,000 miles away. I believe that Congress should have the right to take us out of it whenever Congress wants to.

Mr. MCCUMBER. In one or two of the following sections there are provisions to the effect that the action to be taken by this country shall be taken by act of Congress. Now, why should it not be a concurrent resolution in those instances just as much as in this instance?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The others are in the nature of legislation of a general character, of which the Executive must necessarily be a part; but this is a notice of withdrawal from further responsibility. I wish it were practical that a vote of the people could give us a withdrawal; but that is almost impossible, and the nearest to that would be the concurrent action of Congress.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. Is there not this distinction, also, between the other provisions that the Senator from North Dakota refers to and this one: The other provisions really restrain the action of the President, and require the concurrence of Congress, while the provision that the Senator is now discussing relates to action independent of the President?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the distinction is well taken.

Mr. President, I really only intended to express my support of the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, upon the theory that there were things that we were going to do in these reservations that pertained to our domestic matters, that pertained to the question of administrative or legislative responsibility, and it seems to me hardly wise to ask these other nations to approve our action on these lines.

There is also the reservation, which I have not reached, in reference to Japan, upon which it might be quite embarrassing to them to express themselves formally, and yet if the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is adopted it amply takes care of the United States in the situation. I am afraid that we will hinder approval of the treaty if we do not accept the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota; and with the express declaration that these reservations are a condition of the ratification, they entirely guard the United States and entirely protect us.

I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to amend gives me an opportunity to say something concerning reservations of which I desire to avail myself.

It is not necessary to say anything additional in support of the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota. He has demonstrated, I think completely, that there is no purpose to be subserved by the language which he seeks to strike out, except to embarrass the effective ratification of the treaty by the United States. It is perfectly clear that it is an invitation to some country to nullify the action taken by the Senate in the ratification of the treaty. It provides that the ratification by the Senate shall be ineffective unless the reservations accompanying the resolution of ratification are accepted by three, at least, of the four powers named by the exchange of diplomatic notes. In other words, if they do nothing the ratification does not go into effect. Affirmative action by three of them is necessary. Otherwise the action taken by the Senate is entirely nugatory.

I desire, however, to assume, for the purpose of the present discussion, that three of the four powers have signified their willingness to accept the ratification, qualified as it shall be by the reservations, and that others of the 27 powers uniting in the treaty shall object. Suppose, for instance, that all of the powers named in the preamble shall affirmatively signify their acceptance of the reservations proposed—Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan—but that Belgium, for instance, signifies affirmatively her dissent or that Greece affirmatively signifies her dissent. Or let us assume that Japan, of the four powers named, signifies her dissent.

Mr. President, some of our friends, who I am very sure are sincerely desirous of seeing the treaty ratified and seeing the league of nations organized and immediately becoming effective and in operation, look with a great deal of equanimity upon reservations, at least those of an interpretive character, that do not materially change the real meaning of the treaty.

My esteemed friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is in favor of a reservation, for instance, which provides that the United States shall not accept any mandate unless the acceptance is manifested by the action of Congress. I do not think, Mr. President, that any argument which can be addressed to the reason of any Senator would raise a doubt even in the mind of an impartial investigator that the assent of our Government could be indicated in any other way, and he has not even suggested that any action by any other branch of the Government, separate from and independent of action by Congress, would amount to assent by the Government of the United States. Yet even in that situation of affairs the Senator is perfectly willing to clog the acceptance of the treaty and the ratification of it by this reservation, which, of course, will give any signatory to the treaty an opportunity to say, "I decline to accept such a ratification."

Let us suppose that Greece, without assigning any reason at all, declines to accept the qualified ratification. What then? Greece is a member of the league of nations. She is entitled to membership upon the council. Suppose she, for no reason whatever that she cares to assign, simply refuses to accept our qualified ratification? What is the result? No one can contend that it is a ratification that any nation is obliged to accept or to acknowledge it as such. What will she do? Whenever in any way her interests under the treaty become involved, she will, of course, insist that the United States has not ratified the treaty so far as she is concerned. The matter will come up first, in all probability, over the composition of either the assembly or the council of the league of nations, in all probability in the council. Greece is entitled to membership in the council. A representative of the Government of the United States appears, and the representative from Greece challenges his right to sit in the council. He says, "We never assented to the qualified ratification by the Government of the United States. Its action as to us was a rejection of the treaty." Can it be possible that we can be permitted to sit in the council under the protest of the Government of Greece, which has declined to accede to the reservations with which we qualified our ratification?

But let us assume that Greece is not alone. Suppose half a dozen of the nations, whatever may be their reasons, make similar objection to our ratification. Mr. President, a notion seems to prevail that there is some very essential difference between an amendment to the treaty and a reservation; that we can "get by," as it is expressed, with very much greater facility, with a very much higher degree of ease, with a reservation, where serious difficulties would be encountered if there were an amendment. I have been unable, Mr. President, to find any justification whatever for that view. A treaty is a contract between nations, and is in general governed by exactly the same rules as obtain with reference to contracts between individuals, except, as a matter of course, that a plea of duress can not be urged as against the treaty, because treaties of peace between the victor and the vanquished are usually imposed upon the latter by a species of coercion. But otherwise practically the same rules obtain. Now, let me try the question by the test of a contract between individuals. I am contracting to build a house. The contractor presents to me a long contract, to which his signature is attached. It in a general way expresses our agreement theretofore entered into tentatively. I object to article 10 in the contract, draw my pen through the article, sign it that way, and send it back. Although it has already been signed by the contractor, he is released from his obligation. I can not hold him to the contract which he has signed at all. No obligation whatever rests upon him under it. My act is a declination of his proposal with a counter proposition on my part to enter into the contract as modified.

But, Mr. President, if, notwithstanding that, he actually goes into the occupancy of the ground upon which the building is to be constructed, and engages in the work of erecting it, he will be deemed to have accepted the contract in the way I returned it to him, and he would be bound by it.

Suppose that instead of drawing my pen through article 10 of the contract I had signed the contract and said, "I sign this contract, not being bound, however, by article 10 therein." The situation would not be different.

Instead of taking the course indicated he might send it back and say, "It is entirely satisfactory to me. I quite assent to the elimination of article 10." If I qualify my signature in the manner indicated, to wit, by stating that I am not bound by article 10, he could either write back and say that, or he could proceed the other way, namely, by acquiescence, taking possession of the property to be improved and going on with the contract.

So, Mr. President, the nations joining with us in this treaty will be called upon at the very outset to express themselves with respect to any reservations which we may attach. The league of nations is to be organized at once. If they send their delegates and representatives to the meeting of the assembly or to the council and sit by and allow representatives of the United States to be admitted and go on to transact business with them, that will be an unequivocal act which will signify their acceptance of any reservations which we may propose.

But, Mr. President, I put to the Senate again the question, Suppose some nation protests, either protests formally as soon as the ratifications are deposited and refuses to accept the qualified ratification of the United States or when the council assembles it challenges the right of a representative of the United States to sit in that body, what could the council do? Could they say to Greece, "You are obliged, willing or unwilling, to take this treaty with the reservations which the United States has affixed to the resolution of ratification"? Certainly not. There is but one course, Mr. President, for the council to pursue, and that is to sustain the challenge of Greece or Spain or Belgium or Japan to the right of the representative of the Government of the United States to sit in the council.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Suppose the reservation which may be made, assuming that one shall be made, to the treaty is merely interpretative and bears the same interpretation which the council without it would place upon the treaty, is the Senator's conclusion as just expressed the same?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Entirely so. I am very glad the Senator has asked the question, because I desire to express my views with respect to that matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, I would like to answer the Senator from Utah.

My conclusion would be the same, Mr. President, and I think that view can be sustained upon legal principles universally admitted.

To illustrate: Instead of striking out article 10 in the contract with the building contractor to which I have adverted for the purpose of illustration, suppose I say, "I sign this contract, provided, however, that it shall be agreed, and I sign it with the understanding, that this particular clause shall have this construction, namely, giving my construction to language which is or may be claimed to bear two constructions, one favorable to me and the other to the other party to the contract; whether the clause is entitled to the construction I give it or not, the other party who signs it is entitled to the benefit of the doubt, whatever doubt there is in it. I can not take that right away. If we attach an interpretative reservation, we signify that in our view the matter concerning which we attach the reservation is a subject of doubt.

Take the reservation concerning the acceptance of a mandate, of which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] spoke. I do not think there is any grave doubt to be removed. But whatever doubt about it there is, the nations that have signed that contract are entitled to that doubt.

You can not remove it to their disadvantage. Why, Mr. President, it may be just as harmful to a man who proposes a contract to anticipate a decision in his favor by the court of last resort and take away from him that right as to take away from him a right that is unequivocally granted to him by the contract. In other words, no man signing a contract has a right to attach a reservation which will put his construction upon any language that there is in it. He must accept the language just exactly as it is, with all the infirmities there may be in it, and every burden it imposes upon him or disadvantage to which it subjects him.

I yield now to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know that I clearly understand the Senator's position; but if I do understand him correctly, he takes the position that there is no difference between a reservation and an amendment, and that an amendment striking out article 10 of the treaty would have exactly the same effect as a reservation withholding our assent from it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, by no means.

Mr. LENROOT. That is what I wanted to clear up.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. By no means. If we introduce an amendment to strike out article 10, and that were not protested in any form, article 10 would not be operative as to any members of the league. If we simply attach a reservation that the United States is not bound by article 10, it would still be operative as against all other nations, but would not bind the United States.

But wait a minute; let me propose an amendment. We propose an amendment to article 10 to the effect, as proposed here, that with reference to the United States that article shall not bind any nation except in the particular case it through proper governmental action deems the case one in which it should act. That would be an amendment to article 10, and it would, in effect, be exactly the same as a reservation to the effect that this is signed upon the understanding that article 10 shall be binding upon no nation unless in the particular case the obligation is determined by the appropriate governmental authority of the member affected. In other words, you can accomplish exactly the same result by appropriate language whether you put it on in the shape of an amendment or a reservation.

Let me illustrate further. One of the so-called Fall amendments proposed to strike out the word "associated" in the articles referring to the plebiscite in Upper Silesia. Under those circumstances, if that amendment were adopted, the plebiscite would go on, the commission conducting it being composed of representatives of the other nations. It was also provided that troops should be supplied to preserve order during the taking of the plebiscite in Upper Silesia. Taking out the word "associated" left it, in effect, that troops should be supplied by all the other nations. That was an amendment to the treaty. That was the effect of it. But a reservation will be proposed to the effect that the treaty is ratified upon the understanding and with the express declaration upon the part of the United States that it shall not be obligated, and that it will not either appoint a representative upon the commission or send troops to Silesia. What is the difference between the two?

Mr. LENROOT. There is no difference in that particular case.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. LENROOT. But does not the Senator concede——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, he can not present a case of a reservation to which I can not submit a counter proposition in the nature of an amendment of the text that will accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. LENROOT. That is possibly true; but take this very list of reservations that is before the Senate. There is no one of them that constitutes an amendment as affecting the relations of the other members to each other.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is quite true, but the same thing could be accomplished by putting the amendment in the body of the treaty, expressing the idea in the body of the treaty that that particular provision should be applicable to or binding upon the United States.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In just a moment. The point I am trying to make is that, so far as the acceptance of the qualified resolution of ratification is concerned, it makes no difference whatever whether you put the idea into the resolution of ratification in the nature of a reservation or put it in the body of the treaty. In either case the amendment proposed or the reservation, by whatever name you may term it, may be accepted either by a direct and positive act, by an exchange of notes, or it may be accepted by proceeding as is expressed in its terms.

Mr. LENROOT. There is just this difference, is there not, that there is a settled practice that reservations may be accepted by acquiescence, by silence; but does the Senator know of any case where an amendment in form to a treaty was so accepted and made operative?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not undertaken to inquire, but there is not the slightest reason to doubt that an amendment to a treaty may be accepted by acquiescence, in silence, and that the country may be estopped just as well as otherwise.

To illustrate: Suppose we strike out article 10, and then we send our representatives to the council, and they are admitted there, and all the nations of the earth go on and proceed upon that basis. Who can doubt that they all thus admit that article 10 has ceased to be an active feature of the covenant?

I now yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I want to get the Senator's judgment on this state of facts: Suppose we should adopt a reservation here that would prove satisfactory to one or more of the high contracting parties. Does the Senator think it would then be incumbent upon that nation or upon those nations, by affirmative action, to signify its or their dissent to the reservation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the country would not be called upon to signify either its assent or its dissent until it was called upon to act.

Mr. GORE. Then, in what state would that leave us? Would we be in a state of war or a state of peace or of suspended relationship until they did signify their assent or dissent? Of course, if they acquiesced——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If Germany acquiesced, we would be in a state of peace with Germany. If Greece, for instance, did not acquiesce, we would be in a state of peace with Greece, because the state of peace with Greece never has been disturbed. But there are interdependent undertakings in the treaty. Generally it is a treaty with Germany, but there are provisions which practically amount to a treaty between this country and Greece upon the one side, or Italy upon the one side, or Spain upon the one side.

Mr. GORE. Most of those stipulations, however, impose obligations upon the United States and call for affirmative action on the part of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can not concede that at all. In fact, that is the foundation of the whole thing.

My esteemed friend, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], if the Senator from Oklahoma will pardon me for a moment, has been speaking about an obligation to send our boys to China should China make war upon Japan for the purpose of getting back Shantung. I spoke about that matter some time ago. The likelihood of China making war upon Japan to get back Shantung is about equal to the suggestion made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] that Mexico should invade the United States or Guatemala should invade the United States. But if China should make war upon Japan in order to get back Shantung, not only the boys of this country but the boys of Great Britain, of France, of Italy, of Belgium, of Spain, and of all the world would be called upon just exactly the same as the boys of America to make war upon Japan in order that China might hold Shantung. However, China will not make war upon Japan in order to get back Shantung, and the Senator is talking about a thing that is as impossible as arresting the sun in its passage through the heavens.

I want to say that exactly in the same way there are no more obligations upon the United States under this treaty that there are upon Greece. The obligations that rest upon us likewise rest upon Greece.

Mr. GORE. There are no obligations on the part of other nations to act affirmatively in our behalf except to come to our rescue in case Mexico should invade the United States and attempt to violate its territorial integrity or political independence. Is not that about the situation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Whatever obligations rest upon us rest upon the other party with whom we make the treaty. Of course, in the situation——

Mr. GORE. The point I am trying to make is that we are not the beneficiary under the treaty of any affirmative action on the part of other nations except an obligation on their part to protect our territorial integrity and political independence. Is not that true, or substantially so?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is quite true, and that is practically all the obligation we are under to them.

Mr. GORE. Then if we adopt reservations waiving the obligations on the part of other nations to come to our rescue, that certainly would not lead to any objection on their part, would it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly not. When we come to that particular provision I am going to have something to say about it. But if I have challenged attention to the danger that inheres in attaching any reservations to this resolution of ratification, I have accomplished all the purpose I had in speaking at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I will yield.

I have thus far at all times suggested the situation that would arise in case one nation other than Germany should signify her dissent to the ratification or should content herself with making the objection when the occasion arose when she was called upon to speak. But, Mr. President, I can not understand how we shall go on attaching these reservations to the resolution of ratification, relating not only to the league of nations covenant but to other provisions of the treaty of the most vital importance to the Government of Germany, in the expectation that Germany is going to signify her assent without hesitation, either expressly or by acts which amount to an estoppel. It seems to me a perfect fatuity to imagine that she will do anything of the sort.

I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I concur with the statement of the Senator from Montana. A great deal has been said about interpretative reservations. Does not the Senator think the distinction between an interpretative reservation and a reservation which shall operate as an amendment, no matter by what name it goes, is that the reservation which will operate by amendment is made a part of the resolution of ratification and a condition of ratification whereupon it operates as an amendment, whereas if the amendment were purely interpretative it would be a resolution passed by the United States Senate independently of the act of ratification and after the ratification?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, that is quite true. I do not think we have any right to attach any qualifications whatever to the ratification without releasing, as far as we are concerned, every other signatory to the treaty. On the other hand, any resolution that may be passed declaring our view concerning the significance of the treaty after it shall have been ratified would, as a matter of course, require no acceptance upon the part of the other signatories.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would merely operate as a precedent as to future interpretations by us.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. KING. I propounded a question to the Senator a moment ago, and I desire to suggest now another thought for his consideration. Suppose a reservation were attached to the resolution of ratification; that that reservation clearly expressed the same view that the treaty itself expressed; and the council, when a controversy arose as to the meaning of the treaty, said "We disregard entirely in our construction of the treaty the reservation and predicate our decision upon the language of the treaty itself." Would the Senator from Montana say that that reservation was an amendment or that it would imperil in any way the treaty or would compel affirmative action or any sort of action upon the part of the signatories to the treaty?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I supposed I had made myself perfectly clear. If we were to attach an interpretative reservation, and it was either accepted by the other parties to the treaty or they thereafter acted in such a way as to indicate their acceptance of it, it would become an essential part of the treaty, and the council would be bound by it. That is all there is to that. The council would not be at liberty, as a matter of course, to disregard that any more than if it were written into the body of the instrument.

Perhaps I did not make myself entirely clear in answering the first question the Senator addressed to me. By reason of the extensive experience the Senator has had as a lawyer, he recognizes that the most serious controversies will arise concerning almost every contract of any importance that may be drafted. The difficulties that will arise may easily be anticipated; but frequently they are not anticipated, and they give rise to heated controversies involving enormous interests, eventually going clear to the Supreme Court of the United States. That may result from the simple matter of the construction of the contract, one side contending for one construction and the other side contending for another. Let me assume that one of the parties to the contract shrewdly anticipated that just such a question as that might arise, and in order to insure an interpretation such as he desired he signed it qualifiedly to the effect that the particular clause should have the construction for which he contended. Would that be an acceptance, so far as the other man was concerned? He may be wrong about it; the correct construction may be the other way; and the man who drafted the contract and sent it with his signature to the other party is entitled to have it signed just exactly as he signed it, without any qualifications whatever which would in any way affect or imperil his rights. As has been expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States, the man who proposes the contract is himself the judge of the importance of any terms that may be in it, and he is entitled to have it accepted just exactly as he proposes it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me one other question, I desire to invite his attention to another matter in view of the statement which he has made. It seems to me that if any of the provisions in the treaty are susceptible of any misconstruction, so far as possible we ought to eliminate the possibility of such misconstruction. It has been contended by the proponents of the treaty and by its advocates that the treaty clearly means that the United States or any signatory may withdraw upon two years' notice and that no one but the withdrawing member will have the right to determine whether it has observed its international or other obligations. If that is clearly the meaning of the treaty and if that is the construction which we place upon it, what objection can there be to annexing a reservation in which it is stated that that is the interpretation and that we ratify it with that reservation? Does not that preclude any controversy and make clear a matter concerning which otherwise there might be some controversy? It seems to me that it would be a misfortune in a contract of such tremendous importance as this to leave it open for, using the language of the Senator, some shrewd contracting party to have in mind some interpretation different from that which at the time was concededly placed upon the contract itself by all of the signatories to it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, there is not the slightest doubt that wherever any doubt arises about anything it would be advisable to clear up the doubt by an unequivocal declaration with respect to the matter; but the point I am trying to make to the Senator is that whenever we do that we release the other party from the obligation of the contract and they are under no kind of obligation to accept. Whenever you attach a reservation declaring that the meaning of a particular clause is thus and so, you by that very act confess that there is some doubt about it and you want to resolve the doubt in your own favor.

Mr. President, if it were not that by that act we would release Germany beyond question from the obligation of her ratification and possibly imperil the success of the treaty by raising objections from other countries, I should not have the slighest objection in the world to a reservation of that character, but I do not regard the doubt involved of such moment or importance as to justify me in imperiling the acceptance of the treaty by any such reservation or qualification of the resolution of ratification.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator another question. Does the Senator think that any amendment to the covenant of the league or any reservation affecting it alone would have to be submitted to Germany or require her approval or disapproval? I understand from the reading of the treaty that whenever any three of the associated powers, including Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States, ratify the treaty, then amendments may be made to the league covenant in the manner provided; that is, the council must be unanimous and a majority of the members of the assembly must concur in the amendment; but the amendment could be made, and Germany would have absolutely nothing to say as to the amendment, whether it took the form of a reservation or whether it took the form of a textual amendment to the league covenant itself.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am very sure the Senator from Utah upon reflection will not feel that he can sustain that position. There is not a doubt in the world about the ability of the members of the league after the league is organized to make such amendments as they see fit; and after we become a member of the league we may then, as a matter of course, effect a change in the covenant, if we see fit, as therein provided; but we are entering into a treaty with Germany, the United States upon one side and Germany upon the other; that is the foundation of the whole thing; and we can not introduce anything into that treaty affecting in any way whatever the interests of Germany without Germany's consent. We must take the thing as it stands; we must accept the treaty as Germany has ratified it. Thereafter amendments of any character may be effected as provided in the treaty; but we can not make a condition of our acceptance of the treaty in any way so as to bind Germany, a condition that the covenant is in any respect to be amended except in the manner provided in the covenant itself.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When the Senator says we can not modify the treaty so as to affect Germany, of course I assume he means as between us and Germany.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator agrees that all of the obligations of the treaty are in effect between Germany and the other European powers whenever they have ratified it, does he not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Whenever three of them have ratified it, that is true beyond a doubt.

Now, Mr. President, just one other matter. Speaking about the reservation concerning mandates, referred to by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], I think it would be signally unfortunate if we should endeavor to incorporate in this treaty any provision concerning our own governmental organization. That is a matter with which properly the other signatories of the treaty have nothing to do. Why should we undertake to say how the assent of the Government of the United States should be expressed in a provision of the treaty?

There are other provisions of the treaty which require action upon the part of the United States. For instance, one of the original articles provides that the assembly shall consist of one representative of each member of the league. It has been suggested that the covenant ought to have provided how these members are to be appointed. It is a matter of no consequence to France how we appoint our representative, nor to us how France appoints her representative, or at least it ought not to be. When we come to negotiate treaties we do not inquire how a particular ambassador or diplomatic representative was appointed. It is enough for us that he represents the government by which he is accredited. Each government has its own particular method of making such appointments, and when it is provided in the treaty that the assembly shall consist of one representative from each member of the league, why should there be a provision in respect to the manner in which the representative is to be appointed?

Take the matter of amendments to the league covenant. Suggested amendments go into effect when they are ratified by the governments having representatives upon the council and by a majority of the other members of the council, but how the amendment is thereafter to be ratified is, as a matter of course, left to the peculiar institutions of each country. There are a number of reservations which contain similar provisions in relation to how we shall arrange our own affairs in this country, a thing which it seems to me is rather humiliating and an evidence of a want of entire self and national respect upon the part of the Senate and the Congress of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LODGE. I was just about to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAPPER in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. McKELLAR. My colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], is detained in his room by illness.

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence on official business of my colleague, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. REED. I desire to announce to the Senate that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on account of sickness. He is confined to his room and his bed. The Senator asked me this morning, when I called on him, to say that he would be here in the Senate if it was a physical possibility for him to be here, but that his doctor had absolutely commanded him to keep to his room.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My colleague, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], is absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there are in this instrument 15 separate articles of reservation. There have been offered perhaps 15 or 20 other reservations. I am quite certain that additional reservations will be added. It is safe to say that this treaty will go out of the Senate with not less than 20 separate reservations attached. Now, what does that mean? It means that if this preamble, or reservation No. 1, is to go unchallenged every one of three separate countries must pass upon affirmatively and must accept every one of these 20 separate reservations without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." If any one of these nations should have the audacity to suggest that there was anything in any one of these reservations that was not clear or definite and that it wanted to modify it by an explanation, such explanation—such qualified assent, even—would have the effect of defeating the ratification of this treaty by the Senate of the United States.

I want to make that just as clear as it is possible to make it. I do not think anyone will for a moment question the assertion. It is necessary, in order that this ratification shall have any effect, that three out of four of these countries shall accept each and every one of these 15 or 20 reservations.

Now, let us take one of the reservations. I want to call your attention to the seventh reservation:

> The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan.

The treaty, Mr. President, transfers from Germany to Japan all of the German interests. This reservation which we propose to make states that we will not recognize that. In other words, we practically amend the treaty to that extent. Now, we put that back to Japan. Japan, therefore, has to agree that she will accept our reservation, which takes from her that which she has obtained by war. Japan, of course, will not accept it. No one thinks for a single moment that Japan will accept it. Therefore we are brought right back to the three nations—Great Britain, France, and Italy—and each and every one of those nations must accept each and every one of these reservations without the slightest qualification and without any opportunity on their part to say that they are not favorable to this reservation or that they would like a little change in the other reservation. Any action on their part which changes them or any failure to accept them in toto would defeat the ratification by the Senate of the United States.

I want to avoid that, if possible. Many of us have fought here day after day for the purpose of preventing anything that we thought would send this treaty back for further action by any one or all of the other powers. Now we propose not only to send it back for ratification, but we propose to send it back in such form that unless they ratify it in toto, without a suggestion of any change, they have vitiated our ratification of the treaty.

Now, I want to get at the fact as to whether we are certain that all these nations will do that thing with reference to every one of these reservations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to inquire of the Senator whether he has considered this fact:

This treaty is one of the comparatively few treaties that have been considered, not by the administrative or executive authorities of the Governments of France and Great Britain, but that have been considered, in the case of Great Britain, by the House of Commons, and in the case of France by the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, if the treaty has been ratified on the part of Great Britain by authority of the House of Commons, what power is there in the Government of Great Britain to exchange a note acceding to a modification of that? Would it not be necessary to submit the matter to the House of Commons in Great Britain, and would it not be necessary in France to submit it to the Chamber of Deputies?

Mr. McCUMBER. While it might not be absolutely necessary under their form of government, it would seem to me that in Great Britain at least, under their theory of government, they would in all probability refer it back to Parliament.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The constitution of Denmark requires the submission of any treaty relating to a cession of land to the Rigsdag. In the case of the treaty with Denmark in 1902, as we all remember, the treaty which we had ratified was lost in the upper branch of the Rigsdag by a tie vote. The last one was not only ratified by the Rigsdag, but it was the subject of a plebiscite, and when we put on the condition about requiring a note, there was not the slightest trouble; the notes were exchanged. It did not have to go to the people, the Rigsdag, or anywhere else. These things are always done by notes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me call to the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts that, as I now recall it, the failure in the exchange of notes was not to affect the treaty so as to destroy it.

Mr. LODGE. It held it up until it had been done.

Mr. McCUMBER. But it did not destroy it.

Mr. LODGE. The provision here will not destroy it. It will only wait until the reservations are accepted.

Mr. McCUMBER. If it failed to be done, then, of course, our action would be nullified.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it is more than that. It did not change any of the terms of the treaty. It merely called attention to the constitutional limitations of the ratifying power in the United States. We could not undertake to assume a position toward the church in Denmark, and so stated; and, of course, Denmark had not expected that we would; but out of excess of caution that was called to their attention, and it was a very easy matter for their executive to assent to that matter by note. It made no change.

Mr. LODGE. It is always done by notes. As a matter of fact, it was done in the case of the slave treaty by notes. It is always done by notes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think we all agree now that by this preamble we necessarily eliminate Japan. Therefore, we fall back upon three other countries, each of which must accept in toto each and every one of these reservations. Now, I want to see whether there is any probability that any one of these nations will refuse to accept them without some modification or some explanation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if it is his contention that the Parliament of Great Britain, for instance, having accepted the treaty, as it has done, would the governmental or administrative authorities of Great Britain have the right by a separate note only to agree to any modification of the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. Great Britain's system is different from that of any other country. It can be accepted by the King alone. The whole treaty can be accepted by the King alone. The reference of it to Parliament is merely a voluntary act of the minister for foreign affairs. In other countries, like France, for instance, ratification is required by the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate. There is no occasion to send this treaty back there. These things are always done by notes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand that they are done by notes when the parliamentary body has not directly acted upon them. I can understand how the administrative branch would have the authority in that case.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will pardon me, in the case of the reservation to the Danish treaty, the treaty had been ratified not only by us, but by the Danish Rigsdag and a plebiscite of the Danish people.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I wanted to get the Senator's point of view. He contends that in those circumstances the head of the Danish Government would have a right by note to change what had been done?

Mr. LODGE. Unquestionably.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, for years, since I have been in the Senate, I think some 21 years, in all our treaties to effectuate the peaceful settlement of international difficulties, we have been fighting over whether or not questions affecting national honor and vital interests should be submitted to arbitration or inquiry or to any other method of settlement. In our earlier treaties we provided that such questions should never be submitted. That left open to each country the right to determine what affected its national honor and what was of vital interest to it. The result was that nations were disinclined to submit anything that they considered of interest to themselves. Every interest was a vital interest, and everything that affected their vital interests necessarily affected their national honor, and the result followed that we could get nothing submitted in any way for the purpose of a peaceful settlement.

After many years of fighting over this ground, we finally eliminated those provisions, and in our 14 treaties which we have here before the Senate and which have been printed in a pamphlet—I will not say all the treaties, as I think there are some 30 of them—in those that were ratified in 1914, known as the Bryan treaties, we agreed to submit all questions for inquiry, not for arbitration; we agreed to submit all questions that would tend to disturb the peace of the nations to a board that would be selected by the countries concerned.

We entered into such a treaty with Italy, and I want to call attention to article 1. I am about to read from a treaty that was entered into between the United States and the Kingdom of Italy on the 5th of May, 1914. The very first article of that agreement reads as follows:

> The high contracting parties engage to submit for investigation and report to a commission, to be constituted according to the provisions of the following article, all differences of whatever nature they may be which may occur between them and which can not be composed by diplomatic methods or are not submitted to a tribunal of arbitration; they bind themselves not to declare war nor to open hostilities during the examination by the commission and before the commission has presented its report.

That is practically in harmony with the present provision of the treaty constituting the league of nations, and I want to call attention now to article 20 of the league, which reads:

> The members of the league severally agree that this covenant is accepted as abrogating all obligations or understanding inter se which are inconsistent with the terms thereof, and solemnly undertake that they will not hereafter enter into any engagements inconsistent with the terms thereof.

Article 1 is not inconsistent with the terms thereof, but there is a solemn agreement upon the part of Italy that she will not enter into any agreement which does contravene the terms of this instrument and this feature of the instrument.

Now, let us see whether this is contravened in any way. The fifteenth, the very last of these reservations, is a reservation that was attempted to be put into these other thirty-odd treaties, and it was defeated by the Senate, because the Senate in its progress toward attempts to secure the settlement by peaceful methods of any international difficulties, had found that that was an obstacle in the way. Now, it is expected—that is, the committee proposes at least—that we shall adopt this fifteenth proposition, which reads:

> 15. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions affect its honor or its vital interests and declares that such questions are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the league of nations or any agency thereof or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

We will suppose, Mr. President, that that fifteenth subdivision passes the Senate. Italy turns to her old treaty with us, which declares that we will submit all such questions to investigation. We ask her here not only to annul that treaty, the solemn obligation which we made with her, but we ask her to annul the solemn obligation that she made when she signed this later treaty.

Suppose Italy says, "I can not afford to do that, and I do not wish to annul the obligation of the treaty which I entered into with the United States, whereby we agreed to submit all of these questions, not to arbitration but at least to investigation and a report." What would be the result? The result is that you have defeated the ratification; that is all. You would compel Italy, as you compel France, as you compel Great Britain, in order to secure our assent, to agree that positively and openly they will allow the United States to so change their former treaties that the United States will not be bound to submit for investigation any question which the United States considers to be of vital interest, or any question which the United States thinks affects her national honor. It is tantamount to saying that the United States will not submit anything for investigation under any circumstances, because if it is not a matter of interest we will not quarrel about it; if it is a matter of interest, it has some degree of vitality; it is to some extent of vital interest to us; and therefore we are excused from submittting anything under the terms of our previous treaty.

Of course, if Italy accepts this, and she accepts it only so far as the United States is concerned, she does not abrogate thereby the treaty between the United States and France, or between the United States and Great Britain, but she does consent practically to an abrogation of the principle of the agreement between the United States and herself.

Mr. STERLING. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator if reservation 15 does not by its very terms relate to this treaty and does it at all interfere with an existing treaty with Italy? So far as this treaty is concerned we reserve the right to decide what questions affect our honor or our vital interests. The reservation, if the Senator will pardon me, goes on and expressly declares that—

Such questions are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the league of nations or any agency thereof or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

It seems to me that does not at all interfere with our present status in regard to arbitration with Italy.

Mr. McCUMBER. This, the Senator will admit, becomes a part of the treaty so far as we are concerned. Does it not? If we adopt it, it will become a part of the treaty?

Mr. STERLING. It will be a part of the treaty if we adopt it. I agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. McCUMBER. If it becomes a part of the treaty and is inconsistent with the provisions of any other treaty, then, according to another article in this treaty, it takes the place of that with which it is inconsistent. And if it does take the place of the other treaty with which it is inconsistent it becomes the controlling treaty between the parties.

Mr. STERLING. I can not agree with the Senator from North Dakota in that he assumes that it is inconsistent with the other treaty. That is just the point in contention, my contention being that it is not inconsistent with the terms of our treaty with Italy.

Mr. McCUMBER. If a treaty declares that all questions shall be submitted by the parties to the treaty to investigation and report, and if in another treaty between the same parties one of them declares that it will not submit any question for report or investigation in which the vital interest or honor of the country is at stake, I say those treaties are absolutely inconsistent with each other, and both of them can not stand.

The only basis on which the Senator could claim that they were not inconsistent would be that under the old treaty they would submit their claims to a board for investigation, even though they affected the vital interest and national honor, while under this they could not submit any claim that would affect the vital interest and the honor of the country. The one or the other must govern, and the two are absolutely inconsistent.

Suppose that Italy should say, "That ought to be cleared up. I want the right to submit questions involving even what I might consider and what the United States might consider as of vital interest for, at least, investigation. I want to preserve that. The United States declares that that will not be preserved, and I have got to accept the dictum of the United States on that. If I refuse to do so, I destroy the treaty of peace with Germany, and the United States at least has no treaty of peace with Germany."

I simply call attention to that as one of the reasons why we should not attempt to compel these other countries to enter into a subsequent and a different agreement with us than they have made before, and that by silent acquiescence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll; but the Chair is going to begin pretty soon to enforce the rule that argument is not the transaction of business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have the amendment stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, in what is known as reservation No. 1, in line 3, after the word "ratification," to strike out the remainder of the reservation in the following words:

Which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of said resolution of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when Mr. SHIELDS's name was called). The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is confined at home by illness. I am authorized to state that if he were present, he would vote "nay" upon this motion. He is paired.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. He is absent, and I am therefore obliged to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired for the afternoon with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 40, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—40.

So Mr. McCUMBER's amendment to the reservation No. 1, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in the first reservation I move to strike out all after the word "ratification," where it first occurs, in line 3, down to the end of the reservation, and to insert in lieu of the words stricken out the following:

The acceptance of such reservations and understandings by any party to said treaty may be effected by an exchange of notes.

I will say very briefly that the only purpose of the proposed amendment is, if possible, to avoid delay in effectuating a treaty of peace with Germany, and that the entire treaty shall be disposed of by the United States when the Senate shall have acted. Under this reservation as now proposed to be amended the President would submit to the several nations our reservations and request their acceptance of them; but the failure of any nation, a party to the agreement, to assent to all of the reservations would not destroy our ratification under this proposed provision.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the amendment. Of course, it is obvious to all Senators that it would bring about practically the same effect as the amendment the Senate has just voted down.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. SMOOT called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when Mr. BANKHEAD's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], is absent, because he is confined to his bed on account of illness, and that he is paired on these votes. I wish that announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as upon the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). As previously stated, I stand paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED. I renew the announcement I made on the previous vote as to the illness of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and now state that if he were present the senior Senator from Tennessee would vote "nay," and that he is paired upon this vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Making the same announcement as before as to the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—40.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Overman	Smith, Ga.

So Mr. McCUMBER's amendment to the reservation No. 1, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to introduce and have printed an additional reservation, which I shall ask to have inserted in the list of reservations. I ask that it may be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The United States refrains from entering into any agreement concerning the matters contained in Part XIII (articles 387 to 427, inclusive) of said treaty unless Congress by act or joint resolution shall hereafter provide therefor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I offer an amendment—and I am referring to the copy of the reservation as printed in Senate Document No. 150, placed on the desks to-day—to the reservation on which we have been voting.

On line 7 I move to strike out the words "three of," so that the reservation will read that the reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate must be accepted "by at least the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan."

I do not care to discuss the amendment, Mr. President. Everyone will see at once precisely the effect of it, and that is to require action upon the part of four instead of three of the principal allied and associated powers.

Unless some other Senator desires to debate the amendment, I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made upon the last roll call concerning my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 25, nays 63, as follows:

So Mr. BORAH's amendment to reservation No. 1, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment to the paragraph under consideration: Insert, after the word "ratification," on line 7, the following words:

Or by participating in any of the proceedings authorized by said treaty.

So that it will read:

The reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate are to be made a part and a condition of the resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of said resolution of ratification or by participating in any of the proceedings authorized by said treaty—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I suggest that the amendment be stated at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "ratification," on line 7, it is proposed to insert:

Or by participating in any of the proceedings authorized by said treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the author of this amendment whether he intends in this way to make an acquiescence in the treaty the equivalent of a formal acceptance?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in response to the inquiry of the Senator I will say that that is the object of the amendment, so that the ratification may be effectuated in two methods—either by a formal acceptance in writing, or by acting under the treaty and by acquiescence in its provisions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mere silence would not have that effect; but any act of the nations referred to, recognizing us as parties to the treaty, would, in effect, be an acceptance of our reservations?

Mr. KING. Unquestionably.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah had prepared an amendment expressing the idea that the treaty could be ratified either by an exchange of notes or by any other means of formal ratification, so that it could be ratified, for instance, by the peace delegates now in session, it might have added to the text of the preamble, because it would have afforded another means of direct ratification than by the mere exchange of notes. As the preamble is now drawn, however, the only method of ratification provided is by an exchange of notes. That is, of course, effective; but it might have also provided, if its author had seen fit, that the ratification could have been taken by the peace congress now in session by the same forces that drew the original treaty. But, Mr. President, if I understand the purport and intent of the Senator's amendment, it is that if we ratify this treaty with reservations, and the assembly of the league of nations is brought together, the moment any proceedings are taken the Senator's amendment would, in his opinion, effectuate a ratification by assent.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. In just a moment; after I finish the sentence. That is to say, as soon as they proceed to act under this treaty, ratified with these reservations, that shall be taken as an estoppel against any of the other nations ever claiming that our ratification is not binding upon them. That is really the purport and intent of the Senator's amendment. Am I correct?

Mr. KING. I was diverted for the moment; but, if I apprehend correctly the position of the Senator, that is my position. In other words, it is quite unusual to require the other signatories to a treaty of this character to signify their approval in the manner indicated by the reservation as it stands. The usual method is to permit them to proceed and they may accept the reservations or the amendments by acting under the treaty, in which event they are estopped thereafter from denying it.

Mr. REED. That is to say, if they do any act under the treaty, the moment they do that act they admit and consent to, by the doing of the act, the reservations we have made. That is the theory of the Senator?

Mr. KING. That is the equivalent of an express, formal ratification.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I think I ought to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin. He rose first.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator from Utah will see that his amendment is very much broader than that. Immediately upon the treaty of peace coming into effect as to the three powers, under the Senator's amendment anything they may have done, even prior to our ratification, would prevent the doing away with the obligation of any acceptance on their part to the qualified ratification of this treaty by us.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, I do not think that would be a rational or a proper interpretation of it.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the wording of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. KING. I do not think it is retrospective at all, but it would act in futuro.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator from Missouri yield for one other question?

Mr. REED. Perhaps it would elucidate matters if I should read the text as amended:

> The reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate are to be made a part and a condition of the resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of said resolution of ratification, or by participating in any of the proceedings authorized by said treaty, by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit: Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

I yield now to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I merely want to call attention to the fact that the ordinary practice is to accept reservations before the deposit of the instrument of ratification. So that under the amendment, in the language in which it is now framed, anything they did under the treaty would comply with the condition or would mate with the Senator's amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I may ask the kindly indulgence of the Senate for a moment, I want to call attention to the fact that the analogy between this and any other treaty is one that ought to be indulged with considerable care. In every other treaty that the United States has ever made we have been dealing with one or possibly two Governments—I think in every instance with a single Government. We have been dealing, generally speaking, with a single question or class of questions.

We agree to do some specific thing in some particular way. The proposition is simple. The countries are dealing with some plain proposition then before them, then clearly outlined. I except from that, of course, what are called the Bryan treaties. The Bryan peace treaties embraced nothing but an agreement to set up a tribunal of inquiry, and the Bryan peace treaties left us free to pick our two representatives and the other nation free to pick its two representatives, the four to pick the deciding or fifth vote. So that under those treaties, when we were confronted with a situation, we were in a position to protect ourselves by then and there selecting two men who would properly protect the interests of the United States; and if we could not select such men, of course we would not agree to the arbitration or settlement until the time arrived when we could select a proper tribunal.

Let me pause now to point to the difference between that kind of a tribunal and the one we are setting up. The one we are setting up is a permanent tribunal. It is not selected for the purpose of settling any particular controversy in which we are interested; neither is it judicial in its character or nature. It is a political tribunal, pure and simple. It is permanently constituted; and when we propose to set it up and to agree to submit our controversies to it, we are in a very different situation from what we are in under the Bryan treaties, when we submit any controversies to a tribunal to be selected at the immediate time and with reference to the immediate subject in controversy.

Second, when we submit a matter under the Bryan treaties we have two-fifths of the deciding board composed of our nationals, of our people, and that two-fifths helps to select the deciding vote, the fifth member. The opposing country has its right to have two of its nationals—two of its friends, if you please—and they, together with the two representing our Government, must agree upon some disinterested person, the five to decide that particular controversy.

So, Senators, I wish I could bear this in upon your minds, on any tribunal that is set up under the Bryan treaties America has two-fifths of the representation to start on. But under the arrangement we are proposing to make, in every controversy where the United States is a party she is barred from a vote, she does not sit in joint session, and the question is decided by a fixed political tribunal, selected in advance, and upon that political tribunal there sits no one except aliens to the United States, and perhaps her enemies. That is the difference between the tribunal we are setting up and the tribunals that have hitherto been set up for the decision of particular questions.

To this political tribunal, which will be composed conclusively of aliens to us in any controversy where we are a party, it is proposed to submit the vital interests of the United States, it is proposed to submit every international question to which we may be a direct party, and if we are a direct party in controversy we do not sit. Yet the character of the tribunal being political, the questions to be decided being political, it is as impossible to obtain a fair and impartial decision as it would have been impossible to obtain an impartial decision in a trial for witchcraft at Salem in the days when they were burning old women for the imaginary crime of dealing with imaginary spirits.

Mr. President, if you will bear these facts in mind you will observe the reason why it is necessary to proceed with caution. This tribunal is to be constituted of what? Of the representatives of various nations. How are these representatives to be selected? It is not written in the covenant. Are they to be selected under the laws of the countries, to be passed by the legislative bodies of the countries, or is it to be composed of those who have been appointed by the executive branch of the Government?

It has been said here that it is perfectly plain that we must in every instance enact laws authorizing the appointment of a delegate, giving him power to act. Does that follow? I think not, sir. It could well be argued, if this treaty is passed in the manner and form submitted, if we place no limitations upon it, that it deals only with matters concerning our foreign relations; that as it deals only with matters concerning our foreign relations, and as foreign relations have been put, in so far as treaty making is concerned, in the hands of the President, subject to the right of the Senate to advise and consent, as in general the Executive head of the Government has always had charge of the carrying out of our foreign relations by negotiation, by the appointment of commissions, it therefore follows that the President of the United States has the right and has the power to represent the Government either by himself or by an agent.

Let us see if we can not find a parallel. It is provided in the Constitution that the President shall have power to negotiate treaties. It is not said in the Constitution how he shall negotiate them. There are no limitations placed upon him. The power is vested in him. So it is said in this that each nation shall be entitled to one representative, but it is not said how that representative shall be selected.

I do not present this as a conclusive argument, but as an argument which might well be weighed and might well be considered, that if we enact this treaty in the form in which it is now submitted to us the President of the United States could go to Europe, just as he went to negotiate this treaty—contrary to the custom, contrary to the usages; still he went and did negotiate this treaty. We have no answer to make as to his authority.

Mr. President, bear in mind now that we have something to consider here besides ourselves. This is the view I would like to get into the minds of Senators if I possibly can. We are engaging with the rest of the world to set up a tribunal possessed of legislative and executive powers.

It has legislative powers of a high character, because it is expressly provided that the regulations which it may make with reference to international matters shall, in certain instances, become binding upon all members of the organization.

It has judicial powers, because it is expressly provided that this organization which we set up, through one or both of its branches, can decide questions of the greatest import to the world. It is to become a body vested with judicial powers greater than have ever been conferred upon any court of the world, whether that court be an international court created for the settlement of an international dispute or whether it be the court of a great country.

What are these disputes that are thus to be submitted to this tribunal to be settled through some one of its branches? Any question involving the peace of the world, both as to the law and as to the facts, is submitted. It makes no difference what that question may be if, in the opinion of this tribunal, it involves the peace of the world, they try the question of law and they settle the question of fact. It may be the seizure or condemnation of millions of dollars of our goods that are being carried across the ocean. The question to be determined may be whether they are contraband or noncontraband, whether they will be condemned or will not be condemned, and that question will come before this body, either before the council or before the assembly, for judicial determination, judicial in the sense that the questions considered are judicial in their nature, but political in the sense that the court or tribunal is political in every part of it.

Again, the question may arise whether the United States has violated its treaty with any other country, and so the United States may be actually brought to the bar of this tribunal the same as a prisoner is brought to the bar of a criminal court, and its right there determined in a proceeding which is in every essential respect judicial, except that the will of the court is the law of the court, and the court itself is a political tribunal.

Again, it is proposed under this treaty to set up a tribunal to compose and settle all labor differences of the world, and it is proposed that the tribunal shall initiate the laws and regulations and rules that are to control the various countries; and that as soon as any country shall have acquiesced in that decree or ruling, thereupon this labor tribunal or labor branch becomes in itself a court authorized again to try sovereign nations for their very lives, and, in the event they do not obey the decree, to sentence them to industrial and commercial death. To do that they can boycott by denying to their nationals the right to communicate with the nationals of the other by excommunicating them from the society of nations, drawing around them a cordon of ships and of armies, and starving them into submission.

Finally, the right of execution is further given the executive power to confer, and these two tribunals combined are given the power and the right to call for armies and to call for navies to enforce their mandates.

Under these circumstances, when we are about to set up a tribunal of this kind, we must bear in mind that a new principle enters. This tribunal when it sits has a limitation, and the only limitation there can be upon the authority of the members and upon the right of members to bind a nation so far as it is concerned must be found in the instrument of its creation, and it can be found nowhere else. We are very much in the situation that we would have been in if we had established a Federal Government without writing a Constitution. If we were to have set up a Federal Government without expressly reserving to the States all powers not expressly granted, long ere this the Central Government would have absorbed to itself every power and gathered to itself every conceivable attribute of government. Can anyone doubt that?

We took over to the Federal Government the power of regulating interstate commerce. No man dreamed at the time the Constitution was written that the taking over of that power by the Federal Government meant any more than the regulation of commerce so that it could proceed uninterruptedly from one State to the other and to foreign parts. That power to regulate commerce has been so construed and so extended that to-day we find that the very wages of the men employed upon the railroads and other carriers engaged in interstate commerce can be regulated by act of Congress. We find that instrumentalities can be specified and that there may be any kind of reasonable dictation by the Government to those who are engaged in interstate commerce as to wages to be paid, the character of their organization, and the methods employed in carrying and distributing goods. Every effort has been made, even in this country, to stretch that power until we in this body have violated the Constitution of the United States ourselves, although I hope no one intended to do it, but so said the Supreme Court.

It must be perfectly clear, therefore, to Members that when we set up a government or an organization, I do not care by what name you call it, and that government is composed of the representatives of the other nations of the world, and when we confer upon that government or that organization by express terms the right to take jurisdiction of any controversy threatening the peace of the world, we have turned over to it every international question, and it proceeds, not limited by our Constitution, not limited by the constitution of Great Britain; not limited by the constitution of Canada, if it has one; not limited by the constitution of France, if it has one; not limited by the constitution of Haiti, if it has one, but limited only by those rights and those limitations that are to be found in the instrument of its creation to which we assent and to which we become a party. From the moment we sign this document, unless we write our limitations into the document itself in express terms, we will have signed away our day of grace and forfeited our opportunity to protect the United States.

Sir, we may treat this question as a trifling matter if we want to. Either this proposition now before us involves a radical change in the management of the world's affairs or it is a sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. If it means what it professes to mean, then we are setting up a power to control the world, and into that power the United States is entering as a part and to it it is conceding jurisdiction over every question that may affect the peace of the world. That means that it is conceding to the jurisdiction of this power every right of this Government, every right of this people, that, in the opinion of that tribunal, affects the peace of the world.

And, sir, it will not do for us to fall back upon the miserable doctrine that our representative has undertaken to do something that under our Constitution or our laws he is not authorized to do. I abominate and I repudiate the doctrine that other nations must take notice of our laws and that they must take notice of our Constitution. If that is true, then we must take notice of their laws and of their constitutions, and instead of this covenant meaning what it appears to mean upon its face, it means what it appears to have on its face plus or minus the laws or constitution of every country that becomes a member of the league. So that instead of having a document before us that expresses the intendment of the contract, we have merely a document which ought to be made to read, "This document shall be binding upon the various nations of the world in so far as their constitutions and their laws say it shall be binding." Then, instead of having a covenant to be written and signed and meaning what it purports to mean, we would have a document to be supplemented by all the codes of law of all the nations of the world.

There is not an international lawyer nor any other kind of a lawyer who would pretend to say that under such circumstances as that we would be safe to enter this covenant. We are safe to make this covenant only if, looking at the document, we can determine what are the obligations of other nations, and other nations are safe in entering into this compact only if they in turn by looking at the document can determine what are the obligations of the United States.

So, sir, if we were to accept the amendment of my distinguished friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] we would be left in the situation that every nation would be asked to bind itself by any act under this treaty, any act whatsoever, without any notice as to what the actual limitations are which the United States specified.

Good faith requires us to notify the other nations of the world. We ought to expect it of them that they would write into the face of the instrument every exception that they would expect to make. There is another thing that is required, and that is that we in writing this contract shall take no chances as to the protection of the United States.

I am going to put it to my distinguished friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], with whom I dislike to disagree, whether if he were an attorney representing clients in a great transaction where there were 40 parties to the contract, and all of the 40 parties had signed, sealed, and delivered the contract to him, he would be willing to have his clients sign that contract and pass it back to the other parties with some reservation as to its meaning and with nothing else to protect his clients except that if the other parties did any act under it they would thereby be held to have accepted the reservation? It may be, if he could show notice to them and actual knowledge, he might make it go at the end of a lawsuit; but as a prudent lawyer—and he is a great lawyer—seeking to guard the interests of his clients, would he not say, "Let us send that back to be recognized by an express act"? I am sure he would.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think that the question of the Senator from Missouri ordinarily would call for an affirmative reply; but I can distinguish a difference between legal documents imposing contractual obligations upon individuals and a treaty between a number of nations. While a treaty, of course, is a contract, yet the method of dealing with an international contract, if I may so denominate a treaty, is somewhat different from the very prudent and careful way that a lawyer would deal with a contract between his clients and other persons. The usual way of dealing with a treaty between nations is to transmit it with amendments or with reservations or with interpretations, if such there be, and if the other nations who are parties to the contract accept the interpretation or reservation, unquestionably they would be bound by it just as much as though there were an affirmative acceptance under the seal of the State.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The difficulty, it seems to me, with the ratification in the form suggested by the Senator from Utah arises from the fact that there are 32 different nations, and, as I understand, the Senator proposes to have a ratification by some act which will be construed into acceptance. Is that correct?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] will indulge me further, I desire to say that I am opposed to the amendment which has been reported by the committee and which thus far has been affirmatively supported; but I thought that the addition of the words which I have submitted would improve the reservation which has been reported by the committee, so that three of the four powers named could signify their approval of the reservations in the usual form of acquiescence or in the manner suggested by the committee; in other words, not limiting it to formal acceptance by written document but by acquiescence in the reservation by participating in the proceedings under the treaty as the treaty provides.

Mr. BORAH. That brings me to the point which I wanted to suggest to the Senator. Suppose that Great Britain, for illustration, did not accept it by an interchange of notes, but chose to pursue the course which has been pointed out by the able Senator from Utah; and suppose some question with reference to the reservation relating to the Monroe doctrine did not arise for the next 10 or 15 years; they could not be said to have accepted the reservation until something arose which would necessitate their action, could they?

Mr. KING. I differ from the Senator from Idaho there. It seems to me they could not accept in part; that there must be either an acceptance of the entire instrument or a repudiation of the entire instrument. When we transmit the treaty with the reservations and they proceed under the treaty, I submit that that would be an acceptance of all of the reservations that have been attached, the same as if we should amend it in several particulars, even textually, and the occasion did not arise for many years calling for action under some particular textual amendment. They could not say, "It is true that years ago when the treaty was first submitted we accepted it, but the particular part involving the question which has now arisen was not then acute, and we reserve the right to pass upon that, though it is a hundred years afterwards before any such controversy or crisis has arisen."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, without going into that distinction, I still call the Senator's attention to the fact that we know one course is safe and that the other is doubtful. The course that is safe is to bring this question squarely to the attention of the nations concerned and give them an opportunity for affirmative or negative action. If they affirm, well and good; they are bound. If they return a negative answer now, they certainly would return it in the future if they had some quibble to stand upon—if it is a quibble; I do not think it is. So the road of safety, the road of honor, is in submitting this proposition absolutely to them so that they must accept or must reject. That is the first observation I make.

Mr. KING rose.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Utah desire to interrupt me?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if it is the road of honor to pursue the course just indicated by the Senator from Missouri—and I express no opinion, one way or the other, with respect to that—would we not be living up to that standard of honor to a higher degree if we required a written acceptance of the reservations by all of the signatories to the treaty instead of requiring it of only four of them?

Mr. REED. I agree with the Senator that it ought to be so submitted; but the reason that only three are named is because there are a number of Senators here who seem to be frightened to death at the idea that if Uncle Sam makes this bargain and insists upon having something to say about it, somebody along the line will not sign and we shall lose the blessed and glorious fruits of this arrangement. That is the only excuse; and if I were to characterize it as I feel toward it, I would again be called to order even by the genial present occupant of the chair. But the practical reason of making the acceptance depend upon three of the four great nations is because those four great nations are going to run the league; the remainder of the league is a joke, just the same kind of a joke exactly as was the participation in this war of most of the members of the league.

Mr. BORAH. Ought not the Senator to say a tragedy?

Mr. REED. No; it did not rise to the dignity of a tragedy; they did not even let a drop of blood, and you always think there is going to be a little blood shed in a tragedy. Let us see what Liberia's part was. This is leading me from the discussion, but I will follow it for a moment.

Liberia declared war and then borrowed four or five million dollars from the United States. That was their contribution to the war. Liberia is in the league of nations in just the same way that she was in the war. Of course she can be voted, and that will be a very convenient vote when the market is troublesome. Haiti I believe also declared war. What she got out of it I do not know. A number of the other nations declared war, but their participation in the war consisted in passing a resolution declaring war; it began with a resolution and it ended when the reverberations of the vote had died away. So that it probably may be immaterial whether this proposition is submitted to some of these other nations. I do not include them all, for some of them are big enough to be consulted; but as to a number of them they are joke nations and they have been joke nations always, or else they have been tragedies in the course of time as has been suggested.

Now let us see the difference between the Senator's proposition and the one I am trying to present. I think we can get at it best by an illustration. I should like to have the Senator's attention, if I may, because I am really making this speech to him, and I expect to convert him, although I do not expect him to admit it.

Mr. KING. If I am converted, I will admit it.

Mr. REED. Suppose we were making a simple treaty with Great Britain relating to the appointment of a commission to determine a question regarding fisheries—a simple dispute—and suppose we were to write into the treaty as a reservation the proposition that there should be seven commissioners instead of five. Then if we were to carry that back to Great Britain and Great Britain appointed her three commissioners and we appointed our three and they together appointed a seventh, we could, of course, say that Great Britain had acquiesced, and by acquiescence had bound herself, for she would have taken the affirmative act specified by the change in the treaty to be taken. But suppose, upon the other hand, instead of that sort of an arrangement we were simply providing for a tribunal to be set up at Geneva to which were to go delegates from all the nations of the world. When it sits down there to act it is not acting under our treaty; it is not acting under our instrument; it is acting under general powers conferred by the nations of the world, and it proceeds to its work of legislation, and our delegate sits there and votes and his vote is recorded and counted. Can we not, to use an old expression, go back of the returns, back of the face of his authority, and say, "There is something written in this instrument to the effect that if anything is done under this treaty it shall mean something other and different from what you said it should mean when you wrote it; we made a change, and we have said any act done under the treaty validates that change, although you may never have seen it, and even if you have seen it, you have not recognized it"?

With this I drop the question, because it is desired by some that we shall do some more voting; but I submit to the Senator, as a lawyer, whether the safe thing to do is not to require these nations to give an absolute assent? What is to be lost by it? How long will it take? If these nations are so reluctant to enter into this treaty to-day that they will back out because the United States proposes, in order to protect itself under its Constitution, to reserve rights that have been reserved under that instrument, then we ought not to be going into the agreement at all, for, mark you, this is to be a brotherhood, a family, where love is to reign, where the differences of the earth are to be composed; and if we are so far apart now that we have to fudge our way in and get a ratification of our changes by them by inference instead of by direct act, it is a good time to stay out.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	Lodge	Sheppard
Ball	Gronna	McCormick	Sherman
Borah	Hale	McCumber	Simmons
Brandegee	Harding	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.
Calder	Harris	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Capper	Harrison	McNary	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Henderson	Moses	Smith, S. C.
Colt	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smoot
Culberson	Johnson, Calif.	New	Spencer
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Newberry	Sterling
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Sutherland
Dial	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Swanson
Dillingham	Kellogg	Overman	Thomas
Edge	Kendrick	Page	Trammell
Elkins	Kenyon	Phelan	Underwood
Fall	Keyes	Phipps	Wadsworth
Fernald	King	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	Kirby	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
France	Knox	Ransdell	Watson
Gay	La Follette	Reed	Williams
Gerry	Lenroot	Robinson	Wolcott

Mr. CURTIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, upon further consideration of the amendment submitted a few moments ago, I am inclined to think the suggestion made by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] indicates that there was quite a serious imperfection in that amendment. I offer this as a substitute for it:

Or by recognizing the United States as a party to the treaty.

So that it will read:

Which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of said resolution of ratification, or by recognizing the United States as a party to the treaty, by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit—

And so forth.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely desire to state that I hope we can take a vote on this substitute. Of course, I need hardly say that every Senator realizes that it is entirely destructive of the conditions reported by the committee.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I only desire to add a word along that line.

I think the amendment tends to make uncertain a very certain and a very correct diplomatic practice. Senators all know that in the process of making a treaty the negotiators first reduce the agreement to writing; and it is always the practice, if the negotiators have any doubt after the document has been once reduced to writing and signed, and it becomes inconvenient to redraft it, to exchange notes to indicate the meaning and the understanding that is to be attached to particular clauses.

Our function is somewhat similar to that of a negotiator. When the treaty comes into the Senate we have the power to make reservations or amendments or modifications, as our judgment may dictate; and it seems to me that the same practice that is followed by the negotiators, and which is almost universal, is the practice that should be followed by the Senate; namely, that notes should be exchanged in order to indicate what modifications the Government of the United States desires.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KNOX. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact that when the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania was Secretary of State, and the United States and other nations entered into the radiographic convention, the United States Senate attached reservations to the resolution of ratification, and that in that case only one nation specifically accepted; and is it not a fact that the practice in that case was acquiescence, and no notes were exchanged, and no specific acceptance required?

Mr. KNOX. I do not mean to indicate at all that the practice has been absolutely universal, but the general practice and the correct practice has been to exchange notes. The Senator from Nebraska will recall, because he was a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations at the time, that when the existing treaty with Japan was made, one of the most essential features of that treaty was indicated only by an exchange of notes after the treaty had been negotiated and signed. As I say, not the universal, but the almost universal practice is to exchange notes explaining the meaning, and it is a practice that stands upon good reason.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KNOX. I yield.

Mr. KING. If it is important, as the Senator contends, in the interest of certitude, that there should be notes exchanged, why should there be any discrimination? Why should we not require all of the signatories to the treaty to indicate in a certain manner, by an exchange of ratifications, their approval of the reservations which we make?

Under the tendered amendment the limitation is to three out of the four powers. If it is so important that there should be certainty, why does not the Senator suggest an amendment requiring all the signatory powers to accept, by formal ratification, the reservations which we make?

Mr. KNOX. I think no better answer could be made to that question than the answer that was made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] when it was propounded to him a few moments ago. Personally, I voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], that all of the principal allied powers should be included, and I think that would be all sufficient. That was contained in a reservation that I offered yesterday, that all of the allied powers should be required affirmatively to notify us that they had accepted the reservations; and the reason why, in my judgment, it should be limited to the allied powers is that the allied and associated powers have been conducting this transaction from the first. The allied and associated powers compose the council of the league of nations, with such other four powers as they may select and such others as they may afterwards admit into the covenant of the league; and that was an absolute assurance that if this question ever was raised in the council of the league of nations it would be decided exactly as we hope and expect it would be decided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. ASHURST. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I merely desire to ask the Senator from Utah if this amendment is not the exact equivalent of the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], which was voted down?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall leave to the acute mind of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin to point out if there is any distinction between this amendment and that. I think there is some little difference.

Mr. LENROOT. I am satisfied it is the exact equivalent, and I am satisfied also that the distinguished Senator from Utah can not point out any difference. I merely want to emphasize that fact. The Senate has already voted upon this exact proposition in a different form.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, there is a marked distinction between the amendment referred to, offered by the Senator from North Dakota, and the pending amendment, offered by the Senator from Utah. In this case a recognition of the United States as a party to the treaty by the nations named must occur before the ratification takes effect. It is not mere silence, it is not mere acquiescence, but an act of recognition of the United States as a party to the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before in respect to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair as before, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Making the same explanation concerning my pair and its transfer which I made on the last vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] on account of important business. I ask that this announcement may stand for all votes to-day.

Mr. REED. I make the same announcement as before in regard to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and I desire to state that if he were present, he would vote "nay." He is paired.

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—42.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Swanson
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Thomas
Dial	Kendrick	Pomerene	Trammell
Fletcher	King	Ransdell	Underwood
Gay	Kirby	Robinson	Walsh, Mass.
Gerry	McCumber	Sheppard	Walsh, Mont.
Gore	McKellar	Simmons	Williams
Harris	Myers	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott
Harrison	Nugent	Smith, Ga.
Henderson	Overman	Smith, Md.

NAYS—46.

Ball	Fernald	La Follette	Phipps
Borah	France	Lenroot	Poindexter
Brandegee	Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Reed
Calder	Gronna	McCormick	Sherman
Capper	Hale	McLean	Smoot
Colt	Harding	McNary	Spencer
Cummins	Johnson, Calif.	Moses	Sterling
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Townsend
Dillingham	Kellogg	New	Wadsworth
Edge	Kenyon	Newberry	Watson
Elkins	Keyes	Norris
Fall	Knox	Page

NOT VOTING—8.

Bankhead	Martin	Shields	Sutherland
Beckham	Penrose	Stanley	Warren

So Mr. KING'S amendment to reservation No. 1, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on reservation No. 1 offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on behalf of the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before in respect to my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the former explanation which I made, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED. I make the same announcement as heretofore with reference to the absence of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I am authorized to state that he is paired, and that if he had been present he would have voted "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 48, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—48.

Ball	Fernald	Knox	Page.
Borah	France	La Follette	Phipps
Brandegee	Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Poindexter
Calder	Gore	Lodge	Reed
Capper	Gronna	McCormick	Sherman
Colt	Hale	McLean	Smoot
Cummins	Harding	McNary	Spencer
Curtis	Johnson, Calif.	Moses	Sterling
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Townsend
Edge	Kellogg	New	Wadsworth
Elkins	Kenyon	Newberry	Walsh, Mass.
Fall	Keyes	Norris	Watson

NAYS—40.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Smith, Md.
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Smith, S. C.
Dial	Kendrick	Pittman	Swanson
Fletcher	King	Pomerene	Thomas
Gay	Kirby	Ransdell	Trammell
Gerry	McCumber	Robinson	Underwood
Harris	McKellar	Sheppard	Walsh, Mont.
Harrison	Myers	Simmons	Williams
Henderson	Nugent	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott

NOT VOTING—8.

Bankhead	Martin	Shields	Sutherland
Beckham	Penrose	Stanley	Warren

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

So Mr. LODGE'S reservation No. 1 was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on reservation No. 2, offered by the Senator from Massachusetts on behalf of the committee. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

2. The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of notice of withdrawal from the league of nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I move to strike out from reservation No. 2 all after the word "fulfilled," on page 2, line 1, the words to be stricken out by the motion being:

and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

I make this motion, Mr. President, because I regard the notice of withdrawal to be an executive and not a legislative function. I am in sympathy with all the reservation proposed, with the exception of the part which I seek to strike out.

Mr. ASHURST. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the amendment may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, in line 1, after the word "fulfilled," strike out the remainder of the proposed reservation, as follows:

And notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, there is a very good reason why this motion of the Senator from Colorado should prevail, and that is that it would be entirely nugatory if it were left in the reservation or became a portion of the resolution of ratification.

A concurrent resolution as distinguished from a joint resolution is one which does not require the signature of the President of the United States. I read from the definition of "concurrent" in the Century Dictionary, as follows:

Concurrent resolution, in the parliamentary law of Congress, a resolution adopted by both House and Senate, which, unlike a joint resolution, does not require the signature of the President.

That, I take it, is the purpose of this reservation, namely, to exclude the President of the United States from any participation in the effective expression of the purpose on the part of the Government of the United States to withdraw from the league.

It is, as a matter of course, of no consequence to the other nations of the earth, members of the league, how the United States expresses its desire to withdraw or through what agency it gives notice of its determination to withdraw. That is purely a matter of right.

This treaty can confer no power upon the Congress of the United States. Whatever powers the Congress of the United States has it derives from the Constitution of the United States. Likewise, whatever powers the President of the United States has he derives from the Constitution of the United States.

The Government of the United States may enter into a treaty. Just exactly what will be done under that treaty, whether it is to be done by the Congress or by the President or by the joint action of Congress and the President, is to be determined by the Constitution of the United States. Nothing that is put in the treaty can affect the situation either one way or the other.

The trouble about this matter is that it is counter to a very plain provision of the Constitution of the United States. I read clause 3 of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution, as follows:

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Here is a resolution which by its very terms provides that it must be approved by the Senate and House of Representatives, and the Constitution provides that the resolution shall be utterly without effect unless it is presented to the President of the United States and approved by him. That is the principle upon which our Constitution is founded, namely, that wherever under our system, under our Constitution, action by both Houses is all sufficient, the matter does not go to the President, but the matter is reached by a concurrent resolution. Thus a motion of both Houses to adjourn does not require the assent of the President, and it may be accomplished by a concurrent resolution.

So the two Houses may concurrently express their views concerning some public question by a concurrent resolution. The thanks of Congress may be expressed or extended to one who distinguishes himself in the public service or in some other way, or at its own sweet pleasure it may extend the thanks of Congress. A resolution of that character does not require the sanction of the President of the United States. But when you go beyond that to anything that is to have the character of law, it is perfectly plain that the founders of our Constitution intended to express themselves in perfectly unequivocal language that it would have no effect at all unless signed by the President of the United States.

I read from section 799 of Cushing on the Law of Legislative Assemblies:

> When the House expresses any opinion with reference to any subject before it, either public or private, or its will to do something at a given time (not incidental to the ordinary course of business), or declares its adoption of general orders relative to its proceedings—in all these cases it expresses itself in the form of resolutions; thus it resolves upon the sessional and standing orders; that a standing committee be appointed; that the explanation given by a Member is satisfactory; that private petitions be not received after a certain time; that it entertains certain opinions; that the thanks of the House be given to certain persons. (Cushing's Law of Legislative Assemblies, p. 314.)

This subject received the very earnest consideration of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate under a resolution introduced by former Senator David B. Hill in the year 1887. The committee made an elaborate report to the Senate, which I have before me at this time. It was clearly pointed out in the report that there is this vital difference between a concurrent resolution and a joint resolution: That a concurrent resolution not requiring the signature of the President is entirely ineffective except with respect to those matters in relation to which the Constitution expresses the view that the two Houses may act concurrently without participation by the President, or other matters not legislative in their character.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Accepting the position of the Senator from Montana as correct as to any legal and constitutional proposition which is presented, the insertion of these words would simply be a nullity.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. A nullity.

Mr. BORAH. It would not in any way embarrass or impede us in getting out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; it would not embarrass or impede anybody about getting out. It would simply be this way: If it went through, and the Government of the United States desired to get out, and a concurrent resolution of the two Houses was passed to that effect, it would go to the President of the United States. The President possibly might beforehand call attention to the fact that a concurrent resolution, which did not require his signature, was not the appropriate way to reach it, and that it should be done either by a bill or a joint resolution, which would go to him for his signature. If that were disregarded and it was sent to him in that way, and if he dissented, if he did not desire to join in giving the notice, he would simply refuse to approve it.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely. In other words, if this language should be inserted in the reservation, and we should conclude after the treaty was ratified that the proper way to get out was by joint resolution, there would be no inhibition against our passing a joint resolution instead of a concurrent resolution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. None whatever.

Mr. BORAH. So this simply amounts to a nullity?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. BORAH. My only interest is that I do not want any obstacle in the way of getting out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I want to suggest that there has been a very strong appeal here by the advocates of reservations for definiteness and certainty. If we introduce language in this reservation which obviously involves a power which may likely in the future raise a dispute and a difference, we are violating that very sacred principle which Senators are so strong for having definite and certain. If we agree that it requires a joint resolution to give the notice, why should we not put in the words "joint resolution"?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why should we make the declaration at all?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am glad to hear from the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. We have in legislative and parliamentary practice two classes of resolutions, one of which is a concurrent resolution, which is not of the character of a legislative act and requires no approval by the President. I take it that it is the purpose of all in this matter that it should be done through a legislative act. If we want to make the question clear and avoid all confusion, I suggest that we substitute the word "joint" for "concurrent," and then there can be no dispute about it.

I would suggest to the Senator from Colorado that instead of the amendment which he has offered he move to strike out the word "concurrent" and insert the word "joint," for I believe Congress ought to have that power. It should be a power exercised by legislative action and not by mere concurrent resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator from Montana will permit me, I will state that it is my intention, if the Senate shall reject the motion before the Senate, to follow it by such a motion as that suggested by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I simply want to say that the amendment in the form suggested by the Senator from Colorado would take the power away from Congress, and I believe Congress ought to have the power by legislative action at the proper time to act in this matter, but I believe it ought to act by joint resolution, about the effect of which there can be no doubt. I shall therefore have to vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado for the reason stated, but I shall insist on changing the word "concurrent" to "joint."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If I entertained the slightest doubt that the only way in which effective notice signifying the purpose of the United States to get out of the league can be given is by a legislative act, the joint action of the Congress of the United States and the President as provided by the Constitution, I should have no objection at all to disposing of the whole matter by the amendment suggested by my much-esteemed friend, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will permit me to finish, I desire to say it is the proper way to do it, if you refer to it at all. If you say anything about it, of course, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is right; the word "concurrent" should be stricken out and the word "joint" should be inserted in its stead. But, Mr. President, why should any declaration at all about the matter be made by this country? Why should there be placed in this treaty a specific provision concerning the particular method by which the United States should express its desire to get out of the league, without any expression as to how France should express its purpose to get out of the league or Italy express its purpose as to how to get out of the league? When we say the United States may give notice, why, of course, the notice will be given in accordance with the peculiar institutions, in accordance with the peculiar Constitution of the United States; the notice by Great Britain will be given in pursuance of the peculiar constitution and laws of Great Britain; and so with every other country. Why should we specify the particular method by which the United States is going to withdraw? Now I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if the treaty had provided in express terms that the notice shall be given by the President of the United States whether he thinks it would have been valid if ratified by the Senate?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I daresay it would.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. Then if it would have been valid if the treaty had contained that provision, why is it not equally valid if the treaty contains a provision for the giving of the notice by concurrent resolution of Congress?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Because, Mr. President, the Constitution expressly provides that that kind of a resolution is ineffective. It would have no effect whatever without the approval of the President.

Mr. LENROOT. But it is not a matter arising out of the Constitution; it is a matter as to how notice shall be given under a treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely desire to add a word, Mr. President. I quote from Hinds' Precedents, at page 330, referring to the report of the Senate committee referred to:

> The committee found that the passage of concurrent resolutions began immediately upon the organization of the Government, but their use has been not for the purpose of enacting legislation, but to express the sense of Congress upon a given subject—to adjourn longer than three days, to make, amend, or suspend joint rules, and to accomplish similar purposes, in which both Houses have a common interest but with which the President has no concern.

I quote the following from the concluding portion of the report of the committee:

We conclude this branch of the subject by deciding the general question submitted to us, to wit, "Whether concurrent resolutions are required to be submitted to the President of the United States," must depend, not upon their mere form, but upon the fact whether they contain matter which is properly to be regarded as legislative in its character and effect. If they do, they must be presented for his approval, otherwise they need not be. In other words, we hold that the clause in the Constitution which declares that every order, resolution, or vote must be presented to the President, to "which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary," refers to the necessity occasioned by the requirement of the other provisions of the Constitution, whereby every exercise of "legislative powers" involves the concurrence of the two Houses; and every resolution not so requiring such concurrent action, to wit, not involving the exercise of legislative powers, need not be presented to the President. In brief, the nature or substance of the resolution, and not its form, controls the question of its disposition.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana whether or not, in his opinion, the President could give notice of withdrawal under the covenant as it is now framed?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, as I have said to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the notice would be given by the President. The President is the agency through which communications are made from this Government to foreign Governments.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wanted to ask the Senator's opinion as to whether or not the President could give such notice without authorization from Congress?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think not; clearly not. I can not believe that anybody could entertain any serious doubt as to that. In other words, if we said nothing at all about it, the effect would be obviously just exactly what the Senator from Minnesota desires to accomplish by changing the word "concurrent" to the word "joint."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, of course we are all familiar with the provision of the Constitution of the United States which reads:

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary * * * shall be presented to the President of the United States,

And so forth.

This clearly has reference to action by Congress which has the character of legislation and of law. It refers to the legislative power of Congress. The question who shall decide whether we shall withdraw from the league of nations is not a matter of legislation; it does not involve the exercise of the legislative power of Congress. This treaty may have effect as a law, but the determination to withdraw is in no sense a law. We might put in this treaty a provision that the President shall determine upon withdrawal for the United States, and that he shall give the notice. The treaty would be the law-fixing authority to determine on withdrawal. Indeed, it was suggested, as I understood him, by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] that it was an Executive function, and that the President ought to give the notice. Unquestionably it is not a legislative function.

This is a new thing. We simply have authority under the terms of the covenant to withdraw. But who shall determine whether we at any given time shall give notice of a purpose to withdraw—who shall exercise that judgment—is not suggested in the covenant. What we can do is to say, if we wish, that the President shall exercise it. I understood the Senator from Colorado—I may not have caught exactly what he said—to state that it was an Executive function.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. What I said was that it was a part of the President's duty, in the exercise of Executive authority, to give notice of a withdrawal in the event that the United States determined to exercise its right of withdrawal; but the authority to withdraw is another thing. That might depend—and, perhaps, must depend—upon the joint action of the legislative and Executive authorities.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If it is an action in the nature of legislation, under the Constitution the President would have to approve it, whether we call it a joint or a concurrent resolution. I do not think it would be legislation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. KING. Under the Constitution treaties become the supreme law of the land. It occurs to me that it would require legislative action in order to abrogate a treaty to the same extent that is required——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator wants to ask me a question, very well; but if he does not, I should prefer that he would not interrupt me.

Mr. KING. I was going to ask the Senator if he does not think that the abrogation of a treaty stands upon the same plane as legislation and requires the signature of the President?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly abrogation must be by congressional enactment and must be submitted to the President for approval. But notice of withdrawal from the league is not abrogating the treaty; it is exercising a right authorized by the provisions of the treaty. It recognizes the continuing validity of the treaty; it uses a provision of the treaty to relieve the United States from certain responsibilities, but the treaty will not be abrogated. Many of its provisions continue of force as to our country. We may now determine who shall exercise the right for our country. Are we willing to agree to go into this league of nations? If so, upon what conditions? I, for one, would vastly prefer to give my consent if the House and the Senate, without the President, could take us out. It is a matter of our option as to whether we go in; it is a matter of our discretion as to who shall take us out. I wish to try the experiment, and I wish that governmental agency which is closest to the people vested with authority to determine when we should exercise the treaty authority to withdraw. So I cordially support the second reservation as the committee has presented it, with the provision that a concurrent resolution can take us out. That will permit us to withdraw, if the House and the Senate wish us to withdraw, and whenever both of those bodies vote for us to withdraw I am convinced withdrawal will be advisable.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, when this treaty is ratified and the exchanges are made, it becomes under the Constitution the supreme law of the land, and it will continue to be so until we cease to be a party to it. The purpose of the reservation is to amplify that article which in the treaty as negotiated reserves the right of withdrawal under certain conditions. The exercise of that right, when it is consummated, makes the treaty inoperative as to the United States; in other words, it is abrogated. The treaty contains no provision of reentry after the right of withdrawal has been exercised; it is abrogated.

It is true, as the Senator from Georgia has said, that we are acting under a condition in a treaty, but that condition is vastly different from one which limits its life to a certain period of years, in which event it automatically terminates when the time limit expires. My contention is that when the right of withdrawal is exercised the treaty is abrogated; and if I am right in that contention, then the supreme law of the land can not be abrogated by a concurrent resolution; it requires an act of Congress, either in the usual form or by a joint resolution approved by the President of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or, if the Senator will pardon me, by a new treaty duly entered into.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; or by the negotiation of a new treaty to take the place of and supersede the old treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the action were that of abrogating the treaty, no withdrawal would be required and no two years' notice would have to be given; we would just abrogate it.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, we can, of course, abrogate this treaty, as we have the right to abrogate any other treaty, by the usual processes; but here is a right of withdrawal which when exercised constitutes an abrogation, and therefore in the exercise of that right we proceed as the Constitution of the United States requires us to proceed; and to my mind it is unthinkable that we can virtually abrogate a treaty beween this and other countries by a concurrent resolution of the House and Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator concede that it would be perfectly competent to provide in any treaty that it should cease to be operative upon the happening of any certain event?

Mr. THOMAS. I think so.

Mr. LENROOT. And could not that event be a concurrent resolution of Congress?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, I doubt it.

Mr. LENROOT. Why not?

Mr. THOMAS. The President is a part of the treaty-making power, and I think, in consequence, he should be a part of the treaty-abrogating power.

Mr. LENROOT. But that is consented to, and it is the supreme law of the land, and it is the happening of a contingency that makes the treaty no longer operative; and it might be any kind of a contingency.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator may be correct. I will not at present, and without further examination, undertake directly to challenge the soundness of his position; but I am giving to the Senate the basis of my motion to strike out this part of the reservation, and it is upon that theory.

I quite agree with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that while the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is a perfectly proper one, our action, if taken upon that line of suggestion, would be merely the insertion in the treaty of a right which we possess notwithstanding that insertion. The power to withdraw from this treaty is not at all dependent upon any process which we may incorporate in any one of these reservations. It exists by joint resolution or by act of Congress approved by the President of the United States. There is no necessity of reciting the powers there. Hence, my motion is intended to exclude that part of the reservation now under consideration which seems to me to be mere surplusage.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I regret somewhat that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] did not accept the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and so modify his amendment as to meet the views of those who agree with him that we ought not to use the words "concurrent resolution" in the place of "act or joint resolution."

I think I would be entirely satsfied with the amendment suggested by the Senator, to strike out all after the first words that the Senator has mentioned, because in the case suggested by the Senator it is still left for Congress to determine in the ordinary way. In other words, it must be by the action of the United States; and the only way in which the United States can act, unless the authority is given by an act itself, is by a joint resolution or by a regular legislative act. In this instance, it seems to me that the Nation always ought to act on a great matter of that character by the joint action of the two Houses and the President of the United States.

Mr. President, let us get out from behind this screen and meet the issue just exactly as it is. Why is it that in this article it is provided that the withdrawal can be made by a concurrent resolution, while in all of the other articles, where any action is to be consummated by the United States, it is to be done by an act or by a joint resolution? If we, by a joint resolution, may morally bind ourselves to everything contained in article 10, as we have provided in these reservations, then I want to know what good reason there is that in a matter that is far greater than that—the entire withdrawal of the United States from the treaty and from the league of nations—we must do that simply by a concurrent resolution?

Mr. President, I for one have done everything in my power to keep this question out of the mire of politics and partisanship. I think the question is too big to be made a partisan question. I do not care what my animosity toward the President of the United States may be because of any subject or because of any action on his part; I do not want that to influence me in entering into an agreement with the great nations of the world—an agreement intended to preserve the peace of the world. I am satisfied that if we had a Republican President to-day we would not be insisting that he should be eliminated from any voice in the matter of any future action that we might take in respect to either staying in or getting out of this league of nations.

Mr. President, the wisdom of our fathers was that all matters of legislation for the United States and all matters governing the action of the country should be determined by the joint action of the House of Representatives, the Senate of the United States, and the President of the United States; and the President of the United States to that extent was made a party in securing all legislation. The only instance in which his voice could be eliminated would be where both Houses, by a two-thirds vote, declared in favor of any proposition.

In every political campaign we require the candidates for President of the United States to go upon record as to what their policies shall be and what legislation they believe in, and the people vote for them with those policies before them, and when one of the candidates is elected he is elected because of his declarations and the declarations of his party platform, and his election is a mandate to carry that platform into effect. Now, I do not want to eliminate any President from his proper function in the matter of withdrawing from this league of nations. I do not believe that we will be able to put a withdrawal through before President Wilson will cease to be President of the United States; so I do not think we ought to allow the question of who is the present President of the United States to influence our action and make it a basis for declaring that we can get out of this league without any action on the part of the President in approving the bill or the joint resolution which we ought to introduce.

Mr. President, I can not agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] that we can not by a treaty provide that we can withdraw by a concurrent resolution. I think we can. The case mentioned by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is correct. We can not do anything except by law, and we can not pass a law by a concurrent resolution, but we can pass a treaty without the action of the lower House, and the treaty becomes the law of the land, and I am not at all in doubt but that we could provide by the treaty that it should last for five years, and we could declare that it could continue for another five years by a mere declaration of the President if we saw fit to give him that power. That would simply be extending it. We have given the power by the action of the lawmaking power, and, that being the case, it may be exercised in the way we have enacted. But, Mr. President, I want to avoid that.

The matter may come up when we have a different President, and he may be a Republican President; and I would not want to deprive him of the right to veto, if he saw fit, a bill or a joint resolution. The Constitution intended that he should be a part of the lawmaking power of the United State; and, as a part of the lawmaking power of the United States, we ought not surreptitiously to attempt to deprive him of the rights given and intended by the Constitution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I only wish to say that I have no idea such a resolution will come up in the next two years, and there is perhaps an even chance as to whether there will be a Republican or a Democratic President then, so it is not a party question.

Mr. McCUMBER. It will come up within three days after this treaty is ratified, if we ratify it, and we are in session. Now, just take that prophecy from me. There are those who are so bitterly opposed to this treaty and our participation in it that without question they will take the very first opportunity to get us out of it, and if I had their views I would do exactly as I think they will do; but it is one thing to introduce a concurrent resolution or a joint resolution, and another thing to put it through both branches of Congress.

The objection I have to it is not that I think both branches of Congress should not act upon it, but I do not want to adopt any policy, present or prospective, which will say that the President shall not exercise his constitutional function in all matters of legislation, and I do not want the Nation itself to act except through proper legislation. I would be just as bitterly opposed as any Senator here to allowing the President to determine whether we should stay in or whether we should go out, or to giving the President any authority independent of Congress in the matter; but I do want to preserve the rights of every branch of this great Government, and to preserve them in the matter of treaties, the same as in the matter of any ordinary legislation.

For that reason, Mr. President, I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], not because I do not believe it would still require the action of both branches of Congress if it were left in the way he desires to have it left, but because there seems to be an uncertainty, and I have some fear that the President himself would think that he had that power, and I want to make it dead certain that he has not the power to act independently; but I do want to preserve to him his right under the Constitution to be a party in all legislative matters.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator has answered himself in attributing to anybody a motive to embarrass the President by stating that the notice can not be finally effective until after the expiration of the term of the present President, which is equivalent to saying that it can not possibly be any reflection upon the present President.

The last paragraph of article 1 of the treaty provides as follows:

> Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator, so that I may understand his position, if he construes that to mean that we would have to wait two years before we could give the notice?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have just completed one sentence, Mr. President, and have read the provision of the treaty to which the pending reservation is applicable, and I am about to explain my views, both of the treaty and of the reservation, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator, then, would prefer not to answer that question now?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not at this minute. I expect to answer it before I finish.

The reservation reported by the committee provides that—

The United States so understands and construes article 1—

Which I have just read—that in case of notice of withdrawal from the league of nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

It is perfectly manifest, at least to my mind, that the committee, inasmuch as the treaty omitted entirely to provide how a member of the league might give notice of its intention to withdraw, intended to provide for our country one of the methods by which we might give notice that it was our intention to withdraw after the expiration of two years from the time we gave notice of our intention to withdraw. So, in order to provide some method of giving notice, we put in that notice may be given by concurrent resolution of the Congress.

It was not my intention in voting for it in the committee to say that some other form of notice might not be given. It is very likely that the council, or whoever represents the league, might consider many other forms of action upon the part of this Government as to its intention to withdraw from the league of nations which would not at all affect the treaty. The treaty would stand, as among all the European powers, and in most of its provisions would have been executed by that time. It would simply mean that this Government thought that at the end of two years it would want to withdraw from the league, and by putting in the reservation that provision, in case we did want to give the notice required by the treaty, then one method by which we might give such notice would be by a concurrent resolution of the Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Suppose the treaty said nothing about it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Which it does not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Supposing there were no provision made for notice by a joint resolution or otherwise that the United States wished to withdraw on two years' notice. Will the Senator, for my information, tell me how the United States could act, through whom?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, that is just the inquiry that has suggested itself to my mind, and I am endeavoring to state that as the treaty left the whole matter in exactly the undetermined position recited by the Senator from Arizona, saying that we had a right to withdraw upon two years' notice, but not providing how the notice was to be given, the committee attempted to provide some method by which this Government could give a notice that would be effective.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will pardon me again; does he know of any way by which the United States, as such, could give notice except through the legislative and executive branches of the Government combined, if nothing else were said about it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I was more or less bewildered by the question, not being an expert in diplomacy, and I did not know, inasmuch as the treaty was absolutely silent upon the subject, whether a notice could be given by the President of the United States, for instance, that at the end of two years this Government would withdraw from the league. Other Governments have different notions from ours about Governments and governmental powers. I do not know whether the council of the league of nations, receiving a notice from the President of the United States that at the end of two years this Nation would withdraw from the league, would consider that, in view of our Constitution and our law; or whether the council itself might adopt some regulation by which it would consider that its members might withdraw from the league. As I said, I can not answer the question of the Senator by authority, because I do not consider myself an authority upon such questions, and I do not know.

But it seems to me that this is the situation: If we adopt this reservation as reported by the committee, so far as this Government is concerned we shall withdraw at the end of two years upon giving notice by a concurrent resolution of Congress, and if three of the principal allied and associated powers, according to the requirements of the preamble to our resolution, accept that reservation of ours there will be no question but that so far as notice of the intention to withdraw is concerned it will be sufficient.

It is suggested by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that under our Constitution no order, resolution, and so forth, which requires the concurrence of both Houses of Congress can be valid unless it has obtained the signature of the President. Mr. President, to my mind that provision of our Constitution does not apply. I do not think that because the provision cited by the Senator from Montana is in our Constitution it prevents a treaty between 40 different governments from containing a provision as to the kind of notice that the other nations will require of us as a condition precedent upon which to base a right to withdraw.

I think it would be perfectly constitutional if the treaty said that notice given by the President of the United States two years in advance of the attempt to exercise the right to withdraw would be sufficient notice. I do not think that is a matter which involves any constitutional question in this country. It is the mere establishment of a rule by the league as to how to give the notice which the treaty provides is a necessary condition precedent to the exercise of the right of withdrawal two years after the notice has been given.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Admitting that it is perfectly competent for the treaty to state how the notice shall be given, does not the Senator think that it would be far better to provide that the notice should be given by the President on authority of a joint resolution? That combines the legislative and executive branches of the Government, and it enables the branch of the Government that has means of communicating with foreign nations to communicate. The Senate and the House have no method of communication except by postal card or letter, and is it not a great deal better to have it done by authority of a joint resolution and by the President?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think so. If I had, I would not have voted for this reservation in the committee.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Is it the purpose by that phraseology to deprive the President of all power in connection with it and have the two Houses of Congress, without any regard to the President, give the notice? Is that the object and purpose? I gather from the statements of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that it is designed to have that effect. Now, I ask the Senator from Connecticut, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, if it is the purpose of that phraseology to leave it exclusively to the two Houses of Congress and divest the President of any share in it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am unable to answer the Senator as to what the purpose of the committee is. The reservation speaks for itself. It is my purpose to provide one method which may be taken advantage of. It is merely optional. If there are other methods they may be employed. There is nothing here that prevents the Senator from Minnesota or anybody else who may want to give notice that this Nation intends to withdraw from the league in two years after the notice from attempting to do it by a joint resolution or any other method that he sees fit to use. If under the treaty and the law the notice can be given by the executive branch of the Government without consulting the Congress at all this reservation does not prevent that. It simply provides a means by which the Congress can give that notice.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield for a question.

Mr. NELSON. I am opposed to giving the President himself alone the power in this case, and I am opposed to giving it separately to the two Houses of Congress. I want the concurrent action of both the President and the two Houses of Congress, as we have in all other legislative action. It is an act of the highest character——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, when I yield for a question, I beg the Senator not to proceed to make a speech.

Mr. NELSON. All right.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator yield simply for a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If we say in this resolution——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Which resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The reservation now before the Senate. The Senator understands me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I hope he does.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator means the reservation——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will hand it to me, I will read it to him, so that I can make it perfectly clear. I am talking about what the Senator is occupying the floor about, and I will not call it anything if it confuses or interrupts the Senator in the least. I wish to ask a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If you mention a specific way of giving notice, does not the simple old maxim of the law apply; that is, to the exclusion of every other means?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; it does not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How will you do it in any other way after you have said that that shall be the way? Where does the power rest for it to be done in any other way with the interpretation of what the resolution means as the Senator has already expressed it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It does in this way because it does not say it shall be in that way.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How will it be except the way the Senator stated?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The way I stated is that it may be given in a certain way which does not exclude any other way.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am trying to get a statement of any other way it could possibly be done under the language used.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator can not get it from me, because I do not know the different methods the Government may adopt to give the notice.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And I doubt if anyone else knows.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. All I know is that the treaty did not provide the means.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then it would have to be given through the President and the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is the Senator's statement.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does the Senator doubt it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes. Mr. President, having given notice of our intention to withdraw, whether that notice had been given by concurrent resolution of both branches of Congress or by a joint resolution or in any other method that anybody may think is the proper method—and I do not assert it with positiveness, because we are all feeling our way in an uncharted domain; but it seems to me that after the treaty has been ratified, if it shall be, if we give notice that it is our intention at the end of two years to withdraw from the league, and after one year had expired we thought on the whole we did not want to withdraw, we could countermand the notice and withdraw the notice.

I mean to distinguish this provision as between being a withdrawal and a simple notice of withdrawal. My own personal view is that if both branches of the Congress of the United States want to withdraw from the league and give notice to that effect, we ought to be allowed to withdraw from the league. That is my personal opinion. I do not think that one man ought to keep this Nation in a league of nations if the Congress of the United States is opposed to its being in, and I do not believe it could be effectively kept in, either.

Congress holds the pursestrings. Congress would have to approve every delegate and every representative appointed by the President upon all the different commissions and councils and assemblies of the league. If Congress is opposed to our staying in the league, if we enter it, the President could not keep us in if he wanted to do so. I think a fair notice of our intention to withdraw ought to be sufficient if given by both branches of the Congress acting concurrently.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course the treaty did not prescribe any method by which any party to the treaty should give notice of its desire to withdraw from it, because it was taken for granted in making the treaty that everybody had sense enough to know that each country would pursue the method fixed by its own institutions for giving notice of withdrawal. They took for granted that Great Britain would give notice through the King by virtue of the action of the ministry. They took for granted that the United States would give notice in the way in which she always has given notice of withdrawal from or abrogation of a treaty.

Now, Mr. President, the sole actual channel of communication between the United States and any other country is the Executive. How could the House, how could the Senate, how could the two together, give actual notice to a foreign power of their desire to withdraw from the treaty? Through whom would they give it? The Speaker of the House? The Presiding Officer of the Senate? By resolution transmitted through the Clerk of the House or the Secretary of the Senate? Does anybody imagine that, or that either of those legislative officials could be a channel of international communication between the United States and any other country?

Suppose that the House and Senate by concurrent resolution said that they directed the President of the United States to give notice of their withdrawal—and they can have actual notice given, can make the actual communication, in no other way than through the Executive—suppose they thus expressed their will, and suppose there happened to be in the White House a President who did not agree with them and he failed or refused to give the actual notice——

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then there would be no notice given and there would be but one remedy under the sun, and that would be to impeach the Executive.

I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I may premise by saying that I concur with what the Senator has stated as a general proposition, but under the peculiar circumstances here and under the constitution of the league I have not the remotest doubt that a concurrent resolution could be directed to be filed with the permanent secretary of the council of the league of nations—Sir Eric Drummond, as he is now—because it is provided distinctly that he shall make up the matter to be presented to the council at its meetings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know of any country under the sun that communicates with a foreign country through the servants of its legislative branch, and if it can not communicate with one foreign country in that way it can not communicate with a commission representing nine foreign countries, such as is the council of the league. The actual communication, however it may originate, whatever may be its initiation in the country of its origin, must be made through the constitutionally accredited executive power which deals with foreign countries, and under our Constitution that is our Executive—the President.

Suppose that by a bare majority the two Houses were to pass the concurrent resolution herein prescribed directed to the President of the United States—and it makes no difference what party he belongs to unless you merely want to rebuke a Democratic President or to slur him—suppose they gave this notice, and suppose the President just said, "You have sent me a concurrent resolution." Then he would have to determine how he was going to deal with it. He might say, notwithstanding the form of the resolution, "It is really an act of legislation, because it affects the highest law of the land, to wit, a treaty, and being an act of legislation, whatever you may call it, it is really a joint resolution and I have signed it." Or he might say, "Being really a joint resolution, I hereby return it without my signature." Then you would have to pass it by a two-thirds majority. Or he might take another course; he might simply say, "You have no right to pass a concurrent resolution; I owe my authority to the Constitution, which you can not amend, and it does not meet with my approval, and I, being the constitutional channel of communication with foreign powers, decline to transmit it." Then your only recourse would be to impeach him, and you would have no other course; and even that would not constitute giving an actual internationally recognized notice, but would constitute purely a domestic row.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to reservation numbered 2, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

At the close of reservation 2 add the following proviso:

"Provided, That the United States shall have the privilege of nominating at any time any nonmember nation of the world for membership in the league of nations and the privilege of offering at any time any amendment to the league covenant and in case unfavorable action shall be taken by the league resulting in a failure to elect to membership the nation so nominated or a rejection of the proposed amendment the United States reserves the right to withdraw immediately without condition or notice."

Mr. PHELAN. I offer two reservations proposed as a part of the resolution of ratification, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The reservations are as follows:

Reservation intended to be proposed by Mr. PHELAN to the reservations proposed as a part of the resolution of ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany:

"The United States so understands and construes Article XXII as to guarantee under all forms of mandatories equal opportunity for trade and commerce for all members of the league; and that the council, when organized and after the United States shall have assumed its membership, shall have the power to explicitly define and control mandatory authority from time to time.

Reservation intended to be proposed by Mr. PHELAN to the reservations proposed as a part of the resolution of ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany:

"The United States reserves to itself full and exclusive jurisdiction, free from interference by any action of the league of nations, arbitrations, courts, or otherwise, over all domestic questions, such as immigration, naturalization, citizenship, the elective franchise, education, marriage, and land ownership or control; the tariff, coastwise traffic, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children, and in opium and other dangerous drugs.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, November 8, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, November 7, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Infinite Spirit, our Heavenly Father, that the Constitution of the United States of America lives in the heart of every true American; that Old Glory, a thing of beauty, floats in triumph o'er land and sea; that order versus chaos, law versus anarchy, liberty versus license, truth versus iniquity, faith versus doubt, hope versus despair, love versus hate, reign supreme; and we most fervently pray that the days which make for unrest among our people may speedily pass away; that the high cost of living may be swallowed up in honesty, justice, fair dealing; that the humblest home throughout the land as well as the most palatial may be illumined by the star of hope; under the leadership of Jesus of Nazareth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting an article that recently appeared in Science, the journal of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, by Dr. William Benjamin Smith, professor of mathematics in the Tulane University of Louisiana, entitled "Not ten but twelve," in which Dr. Smith discusses certain reforms in the coinage systems of this country and other countries.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, consent will be granted.

There was no objection.

AMERICAN RED CROSS.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for three minutes on a subject of interest to the Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from New York on what subject?

Mr. HICKS. The Red Cross.

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does the Chair hold that to be in order under the special rule?

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is in order.

Mr. WINGO. I have no objection, but is it understood that by unanimous consent we can set aside a special rule?

The SPEAKER. The rule, as the Chair recalls, simply made the matter privileged.

Mr. WINGO. It made it a continuing order.

The SPEAKER. No; it made the matter privileged. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time in order to set before the Members of Congress the purposes of the Red Cross drive now going forward in this country.

I have here a statement from Mr. Henry P. Davison, formerly the head of the war council of the Red Cross, in which he gives his views of the matter for the American people, and I will ask to have this statement read from the desk in my time. I think it is of great importance to have this presented to our people, for there is evidently some misunderstanding in regard to the purposes of this Red Cross drive.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT FROM RED CROSS.

OCTOBER 30, 1919.

As former chairman of the war council of the American Red Cross and now as a member of its executive committee I address this statement to the American people concerning the financial basis of the appeal of the Red Cross during the next week for members and for a new fund of $15,000,000.

When the war council, on February 28 last, turned over the management of the Red Cross to the permanent executive committee, the records showed a book balance of $127,000,000 still remaining out of the two war-fund drives. Of this amount $33,000,000 was in the hands of the four thousand and odd chapters for their local work and $53,000,000 was represented by goods for relief abroad, either already in Europe or in process of shipment. Some $41,000,000 remained available for new purposes.

On February 28 the expenses of the Red Cross were at their peak, this peak continuing for some 90 days subsequently. During that period practically our whole Army was under arms or in process of demobilization, and relatively few men had been discharged from our hospitals. The work for families of soldiers did not attain its peak until the 1st of April. These situations entailed very great expense to the Red Cross.

Abroad the coming of peace opened up areas unbelievably devastated, particularly in the countries in eastern Europe. Such was the magnitude of the task of administering relief that for a while the Red Cross feared that the funds on hand would be insufficient to last until this November. The effective work of those directly in charge of the activities enabled the Red Cross to wind up more rapidly than had been anticipated that portion of the work which was susceptible of being terminated, and for which appropriations had been made on a war-time scale. As a result there were many savings from appropriations made, and the reports for the month of September show that for the coming year approximately $14,500,000 will remain and be available out of the $41,000,000 turned over by the war council on February 28. This sum of $14,500,000 will be added to the proceeds of the campaign which begins next week.

The Red Cross must now complete its work for our soldiers and their families and round out its war-time program. The needs for aid in Europe are simply without limit. The larger needs can only be met by the governments, but there is an imperative call for emergency relief where the processes of government are too slow to aid those suffering acute affliction. The sum now asked for by the Red Cross will enable this great organization to do a well-proportioned piece of relief work abroad, carry out at home its activities planned for the new year, and furnish proper reserve to provide for emergencies or disasters.

The American people, who have responded so whole-heartedly and upon such a magnificent scale to past appeals of the Red Cross, will, I am sure, be eager again to avail themselves during the coming week of the opportunity to enlist themselves on the rolls of the Red Cross and thereby rededicate the efforts of this great organization to the service of humanity.

HENRY P. DAVISON.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HICKS. I will do that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DELLA JAMES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following House bill with Senate amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3844) for the relief of Della James.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House concur in the Senate amendment. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SUGAR SITUATION.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a letter from the Elk Candy Co., which I think is very informatory as to the sugar situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the letter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

ST. MARYS, PA., October 28, 1919.

Hon. W. J. HULINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As you will observe, we are in the candy-manufacturing business here and have been for 22 years. For more than 15 years we have been buying sugar in carload lots.

Last year we were perfectly content to get our allotments on the certificate basis, as we knew this arrangement was absolutely fair to all. Since the month of May of this year we have had no end of trouble trying to get even as much sugar as our scant allowances for the year 1918, and in spite of producing only 50 per cent of our capacity we have been obliged to shut down a number of times for want of sugar, and at this time we are again shut down for the same reason.

While you may not be able to help us just at this time, we think it well to tell you that the writer went to Philadelphia last week and saw George H. Earle, jr., of the Pennsylvania Sugar Refining Co., without satisfactory results, and was requested to see Mr. McCarthy, who is at the head of the sugar distribution for the State of Pennsylvania. All of our sugar for the month of October, 1918, came from the Pennsylvania Sugar Refining Co., of Philadelphia, and we have a clear case by which we are entitled to some sugar from this refiner; but Mr. McCarthy told me this refinery had no sugar to give, and requested that I go to New York to see a certain party of the B. H. Howell & Sons Co. refinery. They referred to their records and found that we got no sugar from them in October, 1918, and for this reason they could not give us any for October of this year, and requested that I go back to Philadelphia to see Mr. McCarthy again. But instead of going to see Mr. McCarthy I went to the Sugar Equalization Board in New York City and presented our case. They stated the matter would have attention as soon as possible, but up to this time nothing further has been done. Our factory is shut down, and when we can not get any satisfaction from the highest authority of the land and also of the State of Pennsylvania we know of none other to appeal to except our Representatives in Congress and Senate.

Our principal object in writing you at this time is to urge you to support proper legislation that will cause the United States Government to buy sufficient raw sugar in Cuba and elsewhere, and to regulate the proper distribution and price of the 1919 crop, which would care for the needs of the country for the entire year of 1920. There is now before Congress the McNary bill (S. 3230), which seems very good; but there is a question in my mind whether this would remedy properly and take care of the just distribution. In part this bill reads: "Securing a sugar supply for the people of the United States and an equitable distribution thereof as are now in force." We feel that the last five words are dangerous. If the present law reads that there is now an equitable method of distribution in force, we are certainly not getting the benefit, and we know that many others are not. The new bill should compel the enforcement of this clause to give an equitable distribution. Unless this bill is gotten through in proper manner there will, without a doubt, be an endless amount of trouble during the year 1920, as this year's method of the sugar refiners will again be duplicated, which leaves many loopholes for profiteering on this necessary article of food which goes in every home of the land.

For some reason the sugar refiners during the month of May of this year accepted orders for their entire output for four months in advance. Only a limited number were close enough to the sugar situation to protect themselves for their future wants, and when the smaller manufacturer and dealer requested his broker to place an order for a car of sugar the way was closed, and closed tight, as we have done everything possible since June 20 to get some refiner to accept an order from us for a carload of sugar, and in a letter issued on October 18, 1919, by our sugar broker he states the refiners would, during the week of October 18, ship orders accepted by them under date of June 23. As stated before, we have tried since June 20 to place an order, and if such an order was accepted by the refiners to-day it would not come due for shipment until about February 23, 1920. In the meantime our factory would be closed tight. Of course you will agree with us that this is not an equitable distribution of this most necessary commodity.

I will state further for your benefit that while at New York last week I called on a number of the manufacturers, and was told by several of them that in order to continue manufacturing the high-grade goods which are greatly in demand for the holiday season they were obliged to go into Canada to buy sugar at the cost of 15 cents per pound and pay a duty of 1½ cents per pound to get the sugar back into this country, together with the freight and cost of sending a man into Canada to pick up these lots of sugar, the net cost was brought up to approximately 18 cents per pound. I was also told that many lots of second-hand sugar was picked up in New York City and turned over to manufacturers at from 15 to 16 cents per pound. This would mean a premium of about $2,400 on a single carload of sugar to the holders of same.

Thanking you kindly for your attention in the matter, we beg to remain,

Very truly, yours,

ELK CANDY CO.,
By J. F. VOLLMER.

P. S.—If you have the time to read all of this, it will bear out our statement that this year there was no equitable distribution of sugar, but that those close to the sugar situation, which may have been the chosen few, could get full and plenty on which to profiteer, while other factories are closed down with a heavy overhead expense accumulating until there is justice:

To the trade:

We are inclosing herewith a price list, effective October 14. In view of the fact that a great many candy jobbers have already criticized existing prices and have used as the basis of their criticism the fact that the price established for sugar by the Equalization Board is 9 cents, we want to tell you specifically the position in which we find ourselves to-day.

To run this factory to capacity we require about 125 barrels of sugar per day. We have received from refiners to date this month a total of 55 barrels, which cost us 9 cents per pound; the balance of our sugar has cost us from 12 cents for Porto Rican washed sugars (which are not suitable for use in white cream work) to 14½ cents for standard granulated, bought at second hand in small lots.

We understand that it is the intention of the refiners to allot candy manufacturers the same amount of sugar during the last three months of this year as they received during the last three months of 1918, and if deliveries are made on that basis, of course, the 9-cent price will continue.

We are assuming (in spite of the fact that stocks of raw sugar are so small that it does not appear possible to us that refiners will be able to carry out this program) that we will get enough sugar from refiners for the balance of the year to average up our prices on a basis of not more than 12½-cent sugar. If we find the refiners can not make delivery and we are compelled to buy second-hand sugars at any prices offered us, then a further advance will be necessary or we will have to close this factory.

For the last month we have not accepted any new business, except under very special conditions, and can not accept any further business under any condition, nor can we ship such items as French creams, lozenges, etc. (except a very small allotment against orders now on file), which represent a very high sugar content, since to keep this factory in operation at all we have to concentrate on items requiring a minimum amount of sugar. Some items on the list, as, for instance, our penny goods have not been changed in price. The changes, of course, will be reduction in size.

The writer has personally spent the last two weeks in an endeavor to secure sugar in sufficient quantity to enable us to run the factory at something like capacity, and we have had a half a dozen men scouting the country from Canada to New Orleans, but apparently the sugar is not to be had except in small second-hand lots in New York, and on such small lots the price of 16 to 18 cents being asked to-day is prohibitive.

We are advising you in detail regarding conditions because we know that some of our people have no conception of what the conditions are at this time, and we trust you will accept our assurance that these prices are made necessary by the cost of sugar and are not put into effect because we have any desire to take advantage of the existing conditions.

Yours, very truly,

ELK CANDY CO.

THE COAL SITUATION.

Mr. ECHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a telegram from the secretary of the West Virginia Coal Association relating to the coal situation in West Virginia; also a statement showing the earnings of miners in that State.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to insert a telegram from the West Virginia Coal Association and a statement illustrating the same. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I did not understand who signed this telegram.

Mr. ECHOLS. The secretary of the West Virginia Coal Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ECHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I have before me the following telegram, dated November 6, 1919, signed by W. H. Cunningham, secretary of the West Virginia Coal Association, Huntington, W. Va.:

Pocahontas, Tug River, Williamson, Logan, Winding Gulf, and Southend Coal & Coke Co. running full to-day with normal tonnage; three mines Kanawha running same as yesterday. Ten mines in New River running to-day, a gain of seven mines over yesterday. Wheeling district, eight mines running, a gain of one. Eighteen mines, all working union labor, northern Virginia district, running to-day, an increase of two mines over yesterday. Mines running to-day will produce at rate of 50,000,000 tons annually.

There have been a number of statements made here in the House respecting the earnings of miners throughout the coal fields. I have before me a statement for the month of September, 1919, showing earnings of 50 employees of the Winding Gulf Colliery Co., a West Virginia nonunion operation. The figures are taken at random from the pay roll. This statement shows that the lowest wage for the month earned by any miner who worked 15 days or more of 8 hours each is that of James Lanier, who earned $142.26; and that of the two men J. B. Johnson and Tony Passalaqua, who worked a full month of 26 days of 8 hours each, the former earned $436.13 and the latter $203.09. It is also observed that the average number of days worked by the miners is only 18.4. Many of them worked only 15, 16, or 17 days. Only two of the entire number of miners earned less than $150. Of the laborers other than miners, it is shown that the lowest wage paid was that of a common laborer, who worked 24 days and earned $120.

The statement does not only show the total earnings of the employees, but also shows the total net earnings; that is, the actual cash paid a miner after he has paid his rent, his doctor bill, his coal bill, if any is required, his blacksmithing, his powder account, his light bill, and whatever other supplies in the way of groceries, clothing, and so forth, he has purchased from the commissary. The lowest amount in cash received by any employee was $34, and only three of the entire number received less than $50.

The failure to work full time was due to two reasons only—first, car shortage, and second, the failure of the miner to work for some reason of his own. About 50 per cent of the idle time was caused by car shortage.

I desire to have printed in the RECORD the full statement, without reading the same.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2472.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANDLER. This being claims day, and on last claims day a bill having been reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to the House, and on that day the previous question having been ordered, is not that bill preferential to-day, it being a claims bill?

The SPEAKER. It has not that preference of unfinished business. The Chair thinks the rule is of equal privilege with that.

Mr. CANDLER. The special rule did not displace it, did it?

The SPEAKER. It displaces it if the House wishes.

Mr. CANDLER. It gives the House that opportunity?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2472.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 82, noes 16.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask how much time is remaining for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] has 5 minutes, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] 1 minute, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] 19 minutes. There are 25 minutes altogether.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the time on this side was given to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 19 minutes.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the objection raised on our side of the House last night to the attempt to sidetrack this bill was heeded, and that the suggestion coming from the Democratic side of the House was followed in order to expedite business.

The bill before us is an amendment to the Federal reserve act. In section 25 of the Federal reserve act provision was made for the first time in the history of our banking and currency legislation for foreign banking. Before the passage of that act nothing had ever been done to provide facilities for American banks in foreign countries. As a result, we found that the great nations of continental Europe had gone all over the world and had got trade in many countries where the United States was justly entitled to that trade. Into South America in particular England and Germany had gone, and right at our very doors had taken away from our producers trade which rightfully belonged to us and which naturally would go to us.

The Federal reserve act, among its many other great accomplishments, made provision whereby banks could be established and banking facilities obtained in those countries for the benefit of our manufacturers and producers, and, in fact, for the benefit of the people of the whole country.

This bill before us to-day is nothing more than an amendment to that act, an amendment to be sure of very great importance, but an amendment which seeks to enlarge and develop what was intended by section 25 of the Federal reserve act. Its purpose is to provide adequate accommodations for our export trade and for our international financial operations.

The method by which it seeks to do this is by making provision for organizations to be incorporated under national law and by national charter to engage in foreign and international banking or other international and foreign financial operations.

The need for some provision for our foreign and international banking is too apparent perhaps to need very much elaborate comment, but I may perhaps take a minute or two in explaining the present situation. To-day the countries of Europe are in great financial distress. It has been stated that they are almost facing bankruptcy. The war has been such a drain upon their financial resources that they are left without money or credit, and, moreover, goods, commodities, machinery, and countless other things in anything like the amount necessary to carry on their business. These conditions do not prevail to the same degree perhaps in South America, but the countries of South America before the war started had need, as they have need at the present time, of funds or credit necessary to carry on their business properly.

We are doing a large export business at the present time. We will continue to do it, because we have the supplies, and many foreign countries have not those supplies. We must continue to do it in normal times if we hope to continue to be one of the leading countries of the world. We produce more than we can consume in this country, particularly in some lines of agriculture and industry. We must find a market for our goods if our farmers are to continue prosperous and if our manufacturers are to continue their prosperity. This country can not absorb all we produce or all we manufacture, and it is absolutely essential for the continuation of prosperity in this country that we maintain our present foreign markets and enlarge them.

We face a very serious proposition. The European countries, and in some degree the countries of South America and other places, which are now and are going to continue to be large customers for what we produce are without the means of payment. They must get the goods, raw material, machinery, for instance, if they are going to continue to build up their own organizations. They must get some help from us if they are going to be able to pay us what they already owe us. If we keep shipping goods over there, the time will finally come when they will have to stop buying from us unless they find funds or credit from some source, because they will have nothing with which to pay us. The only country in the world which can give them the proper credit is the United States of America. Now, this bill is not intended primarily to help those foreign countries. It might very well be a commendable purpose for this country to endeavor to help those other countries in their distress, and incidentally I hope that we will help them in a perfectly proper and businesslike way, that we will continue to help all countries who seek to do business with us, but that is not the main purpose of this bill. The main purpose of this bill is to take care of our own people on this side of the water, and the way in which it attempts to do it is this: It provides the machinery, it provides an organization, whereby credit can be extended to those in foreign countries who desire to buy American goods or American produce. If we ship wheat to Poland men in Poland must have some way of paying us or else we will stop shipping wheat to them. An organization of this kind provides the way in which that wheat can be paid for by them. Briefly it will be done in this way: A corporation organized under this bill will extend credit to those who desire to buy American wheat in Poland. They will get for that credit some kind of security. Naturally they will endeavor to get the very best security possible. In some cases they may get Government bonds. They may get municipal bonds, but at all events they will get the very best security they can for the credit they extend to those in Poland who desire to buy American wheat. When those men in Poland get the credit, they will, through the agency of some financial institution, pay the farmer or the exporter who sends wheat to them. If they do not get something of this kind, they will not be able to buy our wheat, because they will not have the funds with which to pay for it.

That briefly illustrates one purpose of the bill. I want to emphasize the fact that the purpose of the bill is not primarily to help the people of foreign countries, laudable as that might be. We are engaged in a strictly business proposition to take care of ourselves. Time will not permit me to elaborate, but I wanted to show what is the general purpose of the bill, and that is it.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I will.

Mr. DUNBAR. On page 14 it provides for the taxation of these corporations and that they shall be taxed in the same manner as our present financial corporations.

Mr. PHELAN. What does the gentleman mean by "present financial corporations"?

Mr. DUNBAR. National banks. The stockholders are taxed in the same way that a stockholder shall be taxed for the stock he owns in these proposed new Federal financial corporations and be taxed in the city in which the financial corporation is located. Now, suppose one of these corporations is started at New Orleans and has its home in that State. A man in Indiana owns stock in this corporation. Under the laws of the State of Indiana he would have to pay taxes on that stock in the State of Indiana. Can this bill constitutionally exempt him from taxation on that stock in the State of Indiana?

Mr. PHELAN. It will; and Congress has full power to do that. That has been decided by the Supreme Court, and the purpose is this: In line with a great deal of other legislation that has come from the Banking and Currency Committee we want to place corporations organized under the national banking law on the same footing as corporations organized under the State laws. But we will take that up under the five-minute rule. This section was intended to prevent discrimination by the States in the taxation of a corporation organized under this law. As I say, we will take that up under the five-minute rule, and I will be glad to answer any questions.

The bill provides for a national corporation or organization to do this foreign trade. These organizations are formed in the ordinary way, following the stereotyped method of getting a charter with the consent of the Federal Reserve Board. One important feature relative to the concerns or organizations is that all the directors must be citizens of the United States. That was put in so that the foreigners would not come over here and incorporate under our laws and control these banks.

Mr. BLANTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the four gentlemen from Kentucky—Mr. OGDEN, Mr. LANGLEY, Mr. ROBSION, and Mr. SWOPE—having just marched on the floor in a body, amid such tremendous applause from the Republican side, may I ask the Chair who staged this proceeding on the other side at this time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It was staged on Tuesday last down in Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I thought it was staged out in the majority leader's room.

Mr. PHELAN. I thought that the interruption was caused by the gentleman from Kentucky entering the room with a public-building bill in his hand. [Laughter.]

These corporations are authorized to do the things that are necessary to carry out the purpose of this act. They are authorized to sell, discount, negotiate notes, drafts, bills of exchange, authorized to deal in coin, bullion, and foreign exchange, make acceptances and to issue bonds, debentures, and promissory notes whereby to get the funds to carry out the provisions of the act, and to do those things naturally coming within the scope of foreign banking. They have in general two powers; one is to do the ordinary banking business as far as it refers to foreign banking, and the other is to do an investment business. They can not do a domestic business, except so far as the domestic business is incidental to the foreign business. In other words, they are not going to be competitors of the national banks. There may be along some lines some competition, but the bill has been very careful to discriminate between the powers given them and the powers given the national banks so that there shall be no unfair competition between them, and no competition at all except that which is incidental to foreign business.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it permissible for foreigners, citizens of another country, to organize a banking institution, and set up business in this country under our banking system?

Mr. PHELAN. It is my understanding that there is no such authority.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If we organize a corporation for the purpose of doing a foreign business and it establishes a branch bank in Germany, or Paris, or London, would not that branch bank be under supervision of that foreign country and have to carry out the provisions of the law in that foreign country?

Mr. PHELAN. They will be subject to the laws of that country without question, and have to do business in a way acceptable to the country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And there is no prohibition against citizens of this country going there and organizing a bank if they see fit?

Mr. PHELAN. Not so far as this country is concerned. The trouble is that they could not do business there unless they did business here, so far as our trade is concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am friendly to the bill but I wanted to see what advantage was to be given by this organization, and that would be it, to give them a national status and standing here.

Mr. PHELAN. The powers that are granted to these corporations are all exercised by existing corporations incorporated under the laws of the States. The question has been pertinently asked why under these conditions it should be necessary to provide for a national incorporation of similar organizations.

There are several reasons. Perhaps the most important are these: They will get a very much better standing abroad, in all probability, if they can represent that they are organized by authority of the United States of America. People abroad do not understand our Federal Constitution; they do not understand our Federal form of government; and the fact that they have a charter from the United States means a great deal more to them, in some foreign countries at least, than if they came with simply the incorporation under a State law.

In the second place, it is well to have, so far as possible, a uniform system. It is well to have some national supervision by the Federal Reserve Board, such as is provided in this bill. National banks have been empowered to subscribe within certain limits to organizations of this kind. It will be very much better and very much less complicated if all the organizations to which they subscribe are incorporated under a national law. They have already contributed to some of the State organizations, and we will have to let that go along, although all those State organizations have to submit to the supervision of the Federal reserve act. We provided that in a recent act, but it would avoid a great deal of trouble and a great deal of embarrassment and dual authority if we permit organizations of this kind, organizations that are badly needed, to be incorporated under the national law, where there is only one control, and where that control is an excellent control.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. What liability will the Government assume for the wise conduct of these institutions?

Mr. PHELAN. The Government assumes absolutely no liability. These corporations are just as independent of the Government as the national banks are to-day. In fact, they are not quite so close, because with the national banks the Government does pay out of its Treasury money that the national banks contribute to a redemption fund to redeem notes. The Government is absolutely free of liability.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. The loans made will ultimately have to be paid, of course.

Mr. PHELAN. The loans made by these organizations?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. They will have to be paid or the corporations will go into insolvency.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. What responsibility will the Government have in the enforcement of the payment of the loans should the foreign agents fail?

Mr. PHELAN. There is no provision in the bill at all for the Government assuming any liability of that kind or agreeing to enforce the payment of any loans made by these corporations. Whatever responsibility the Government has is its general responsibility which it has toward all its citizens doing business in foreign countries.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. A moral responsibility.

Mr. PHELAN. That is entirely outside of this bill. It is the same responsibility the Government would have as to its citizens doing business in Germany or Mexico or Austria. That is a matter entirely outside of the scope of our committee and of this bill. The bill provides nothing of that kind.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. The obligation would not be any greater with this bill enforced and banks distributed throughout the world than it ought to be now where there is American capital already doing business in foreign countries.

Mr. PHELAN. No greater at all.

No organization can be organized with a capital of less than $2,000,000. There will be many with a much larger capitalization, because from the nature of the business a large capital is required.

Ample provisions are made in the bill for taking care of any situation arising when any of these organizations may become insolvent, and, in addition, without going any further into the organization of these corporations or the method or kind of business they do, I want to point out what I think is extremely important, namely, that considerable care has been taken to throw safeguards and limitations of the proper kind around these corporations and the way in which they do business. When the bill first came from the Senate to the House Banking and Currency Committee there were few limitations and few restrictions, and, in my opinion, and in the opinion of my colleagues on the committee, there were altogether too few safeguards. The main reliance to safeguard the system, which I may point out we have left in the bill, was the provision that these corporations shall be at all times and practically in every respect under the supervision and to a certain degree control of the Federal Reserve Board. A great deal of danger was averted by that provision giving the Federal Reserve Board certain powers as to rules, regulations, limitations, and restrictions upon these corporations and their method of doing business. In spite of that the House committee felt that there ought to be certain definite legislative restrictions, and we have put those in the bill. I think the Members of the House will see that every single limitation we put in is a good one and ought to be in the bill. I want the Members of the House to know that the Banking and Currency Committee gave weeks of time and study to this bill. They put their best efforts into the bill, and they believe they have brought into this House a bill that is good in every respect, although some of us may differ in certain details.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. PHELAN was granted leave to extend his remarks.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I need to say much in summing up the various arguments that have been made with regard to this bill. As has been ably said by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN], the bill has had very careful consideration. We took it up in subcommittee and thrashed out all of the matter section by section and amended it, and the subcommittee reported to the full committee, and the full committee went through it again section by section and put in more amendments. It is a bill that requires careful study, and every amendment was discussed with members of the Federal Reserve Board or with the general counsel of the Federal Reserve Board to make sure that we were not putting something in that was harmful. In fact, in a bill of this kind broad powers are necessary, and there was actually more danger that we would put in a restriction that would do harm than there was that we would place one in that would be beneficial.

As gentlemen know, our national banking system is made up of nearly 8,000 separate banks, some of them in small towns, not very strong, and it is necessary in the national banking act to have many restrictions, because banks are often in the hands of men who do not know very much about banking, and in order to safeguard depositors who trust their money to such banks many restrictions are necessary in the national-bank act which would not be necessary if the banks were all larger institutions. Some of these restrictions we thought wise to put in this bill, which in a sense is another national banking act for another class of institutions. Now, I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] called attention to the reason why there should be a national act on this subject, and I just want to say that on page 18, part 1, of the hearings, will be found the reasons given by Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, why this institution should be given Federal incorporation:

> The time will probably come when the conflict of the dual control exercised by the Federal Reserve Board and by the banking department of a State may be a matter of embarrassment or operate to restrict the activities of a banking corporation.

Then, again—

> Such a banking corporation being essentially a national enterprise, whose stock ownership by national banks was authorized by an act of Congress, would appear to be entitled to the benefits and protection of a Federal charter, which would be of great value in competing for business in foreign countries.

In conclusion, I want to say that the Committee on Banking and Currency is a nonpartisan committee. I want to acknowledge the active and very effective cooperation of all the members of the committee, and especially the Democratic members, who have worked just as hard on this bill as Republican members in seeking to perfect it. [Applause.] Before I conclude I will take one minute more to say I hope the bill will not be obstructed in its reading, and I hope it will be passed practically in the form in which it was reported. We have spread all of our cards on the table. We have not stricken out the Senate bill and put in an entire bill as an amendment. We have shown everything in the way of an amendment in italics, and the reasons will appear on their face. I therefore hope we can read the bill rapidly and pass it within a short time.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to state to the gentleman I am sure the committee have gone into this matter thoroughly and have good reasons for everything they did, but I would like to get the reason for limiting the amount of corporate stock to $2,000,000. I understand the minimum is $2,000,000, and I would like to get an explanation from the gentleman.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman knows that under the amendment of September 7, 1916, only banks of $1,000,000 capital were allowed to subscribe, and this foreign business involves risks that a very small bank probably ought not to take. We felt it was something that required a large capital, and possibly $2,000,000 is too small a minimum.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If the gentleman will yield further, you do not limit the capital stock of any bank subscribing. You do not specify any limit.

Mr. PLATT. Not in this bill, which gives full Federal control.

Mr. HUDSPETH. In fact, any national bank with the capital stock permitted under the national-bank law can subscribe to this stock?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] has a minute. Does he wish to be recognized?

Mr. KING. I do for a minute. I just want to call the attention of the committee to one proposition, and I wish the gentlemen would keep that in their minds during the discussion which will follow, for the purpose of illustrating the point that the opponent, if there is one any more, is trying to make on this matter, and it is this: The purpose of this bill is to create an institution that will be the instrumentality through which we will receive foreign securities as pay for the goods we export. Regardless of the various things this proposed institution may do, the fact is that the urgent thing intended to be done is this thing of marketing foreign securities here in America.

Ex-Secretary Redfield, in explaining this to the American Manufacturers' Export Association, said that this new international bank would take these foreign securities and on them as a basis issue debentures which the American public would buy, thus securing the money with which to pay for goods bought in this country. The Secretary's words were:

> Thus we would pay ourselves for the goods we export, and so the good work would go on.

Let us not forget this language in the discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

BANKING CORPORATIONS AUTHORIZED TO DO FOREIGN BANKING BUSINESS.

SEC. 25 (a) Corporations to be organized for the purpose of engaging principally in international or foreign banking or other international or foreign financial operations, or in banking or other financial operations in a dependency or insular possession of the United States, either directly or through the agency, ownership, or control of local institutions in foreign countries, or in such dependencies or insular possessions as provided by this section, and to act when required by the Secretary of the Treasury as fiscal agents of the United States, may be formed by any number of natural persons, not less in any case than five.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "engaging," insert the word "principally"; line 10, after the word "other," insert "international or foreign"; page 2, line 6, after the word "required," insert "by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. KING. Are all these amendments to be put at the same time? Is it the purpose of the chairman to have them voted on at the same time?

Mr. PLATT. If anyone wants a separate vote, they could have it, but these are merely formal amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule a separate vote can be demanded on any amendment.

Mr. KING. I do not know I shall do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments as reported.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As I was saying when the gavel dropped, the Secretary's words were these, "Thus we would pay ourselves for the goods we export, and so the good work would go on."

Now, I ask the committee not to forget that during the discussion. We are creating one great national merry-go-round for buying our own goods with our own money. That is the result of this proposition.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KING. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I want to ask the gentleman, if the criticism made upon Secretary Redfield is valid, whether it would be possible for this country to do business at all with the other countries of the world unless it do so by taking their obligations? In other words, if we are to be a creditor country, how in the world will it ever be possible to do business with the world if we do not give them credit?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman corresponds to this: If a farmer wanted to do farming and I lend him money on a mortgage and take the mortgage, it will be a somewhat similar proposition to what is provided for under this bill. The gentleman could just as well say about that that I was paying a man so that he might pay me back my own money.

It is almost a similar case. Whatever credit is extended to those countries and is given back to us is not under the term of banking, because for the credit we give we get full value. The corporation will get stocks and bonds and other securities that will pay them for what credit they give.

Mr. KING. The gentleman suggested that in his general statement. He said the Poles will pay the farmer in securities. Now, what is the proposition involved in this bill? An illustration was given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania the other day, who said there would be a large hopper and that into this hopper would be gathered these securities, and that in turning the crank they would turn out the debentures.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not agree to that.

Mr. KING. That was the illustration that was given here on the floor of the House. Somebody has got to pay those debentures. Who is going to furnish the money? Why, the American people, and no one else. There will be a stock sale in this country. It has already begun this morning. In the Post there is a $100 advertisement right now for the sale of these stocks. When are you going to pay the debentures? Who is going to pay for them? How are the foreigners going to pay for them? Have they any products, have they any money to pay for them? If any man can answer it I would be glad to hear from him.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KING. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Was England ruined when she owned stocks and bonds in our manufacturing and railroad enterprises for many years?

Mr. KING. They can not do it only by shipment of the goods. England had the goods.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman has concluded, I should like to oppose his amendment. Let me suggest to the gentleman that he overlooks the whole philosophy of the act. He says we are going to loan to ourselves our own money, and he asks how they are going to pay. Now, we are not loaning to ourselves our own money. Here is the practical situation. This bill is designed to meet that practical situation, which is this: By reason of the war and the devastation that has taken place, and the great waste of property and of life and fixed investment in Europe, they find themselves without any current liquid credit that ordinarily they use in paying for imports into those countries, which are our exports. But they have long-term credits which come within the general classification of investment credits. But the wheat grower of the West, the corn grower of the Middle West, the cotton grower of the South, the small manufacturer of the United States who exports his goods to Europe, can not accept this long-term investment credit for corn and wheat and cotton and manufactured articles. So it will be possible by this machinery to turn those long-term investment credits into cash or liquid commercial credits. The process is this: We propose to create this machinery which will take these long-term investment credits and furnish liquid credits, current commercial credits, that will furnish the exchange facilities for financing our export business.

Now, the gentleman asks how they are going to pay us back. I will tell you. Take, for illustration, the wasted territory in northern France that is going to call for a great deal of structural steel and for cement and lumber. In the meantime it is going to call for corn and wheat, and such as that, with which to feed the people. They have got to rebuild their homes and put themselves on their feet. It will take two or three years before they can begin to pay back. How are they going to do it? By producing some wealth by labor and toil. It is going to take time to do that. It takes the farmer in France and the manufacturer in France 12 months or more to turn out products to sell to Norway and Sweden and the Balkans and to other countries. Then, when they have once gotten back to their normal conditions, they can pay us back and they can do it by this two or three or five years' credit which this corporation has mobilized and for which, by selling their debentures, they produce the ready cash, and they take that ready cash, which will not be really cash but exchanges available in this country, and pay the wheat grower of Illinois and the corn grower of Illinois, the cotton grower of the South, and the manufacturers of Pennsylvania, who furnish them the structural steel, copper, corn, wheat, and cotton. It is a method of turning investment credits into current exchange to meet the current business, which is our export and their import. It is not a question of lifting ourselves by our own bootstraps. It is a conversion of long-term credit into a credit that is immediately available, so that they can pay their own hands and living expenses and meet their own pay rolls. That is all there is to it, in a nutshell.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee. In this bill, if an American corporation is authorized to do business in France, will not France require us to give them permission to organize similar institutions of that kind in this country in order to do banking business?

Mr. PLATT. I think not. I am not altogether sure but that they have some institutions of that kind here already.

Mr. HULINGS. Not under our law.

Mr. PLATT. Well, private banks, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

First. The name assumed by such corporation, which shall be subject to the approval of the Federal Reserve Board.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

On page 2, after the word "Board," on line 23, insert the following: "but shall include the word 'Federal,' and no other financial corporation hereafter organized under any law other than an act of Congress shall use such word in its name under a penalty of $10 for each day that such word is used in violation of this provision."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee why is the word "Federal" to be used? What is its import? Do you want the public to believe that the Federal Government is behind it in any way, to give it greater credit among the people?

Mr. PLATT. I will say that we tried hard to find some specific name like "National" or "Federal" which could be worked into the titles of these corporations that would not be too long. The title "Federal Financial Corporation" was suggested, but it did not seem to fit in with the titles already authorized. "National" is authorized to be used in national-bank charters, and it seemed to us "Federal" should be used in these. We found that certain institutions were already using the word "Federal" with the apparent intention of creating the impression that they were either incorporated under Federal act or had some connection with the Federal Government. Our attention was called to the fact that there was an insurance company calling itself the "Federal Reserve Insurance Co."

Mr. KITCHIN. Perhaps it would be a proper thing to prevent a private corporation from using the word "Federal" or the word "National"; but why should it be compulsory that this particular corporation should use the word "Federal"?

Mr. PLATT. We would like to give those who take advantage of this act and incorporate under it some little advantage over those who possibly may decide to retain their State charters.

Mr. KITCHIN. It seems to me the only good it would have would be to leave the impression that the Federal Government is behind this institution, and, as I understand it, the Federal Government is in no way liable for any of the obligations of this corporation.

Mr. PLATT. The Federal Government is not liable in any way. I do not think there would be any more impression to that effect than there is that the Federal Government is behind the national banks.

Mr. KITCHIN. In a way the Federal Government is behind these reserves and the Federal reserve banks, as we call them.

Mr. PLATT. Of course, the Federal Reserve Board is going to supervise these institutions very fully. On almost every page and in almost every paragraph of the bill something is tied up with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, so that if the impression did prevail, it would not be altogether wrong. The Federal Government is not obligated in any way except to give them proper supervision.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is there any provision here to give notice, as we did in the case of the Finance Corporation, that the Government of the United States is not responsible, directly or indirectly, for any liabilities or obligations of the corporation?

Mr. PLATT. This is hardly necessary. This is simply a general incorporating act.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman himself was very critical when we had the Finance Corporation bill before us and desired that very provision to go into the bill, and we put it into the bill, to the effect that the United States Government should not be responsible for any obligations and liabilities of that corporation or any of its bonds.

Mr. PLATT. The Federal Government was a stockholder, and the only stockholder. I think that is a different proposition.

Mr. KITCHIN. Why make it compulsory that this corporation should use the word "Federal" as part of its name? Why not leave it with the Federal board, without making it compulsory to take any name they want, providing they have the approval of the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this amendment. I think the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is entirely right in the suggestion he makes.

Mr. PLATT. The only amendment pending is the committee amendment.

Mr. KING. Yes. I think the gentleman from North Carolina is entirely right in his suggestions as to the purposes of this amendment. I hope I will not be accused of arraigning the committee, for whom I have the very highest respect; but those interested in this bill undoubtedly desired the word "Federal" to be put in there to help them out in the campaign they expect to make for the sale of these stocks all over the United States. They desired a Federal corporation—I may be wrong—for no other purpose. This work is going on now under State corporations and under the branch banks under the Federal system. In my judgment, there was no other reason on earth except to lead the people to believe—many innocent people—that the Government was back of this proposition. A million words might have been chosen more appropriately than the word "Federal." It will give the proposition that much more strength when you come to fill up whole-page advertisements of this stock. It seems to me the amendment ought to be voted down.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the word "Federal" or some word indicating this organization is to be under Federal control not only properly belongs here but it is rather essential that it should be retained.

I remember discussing our trade difficulties——

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. In a moment I will. I remember discussing our trade difficulties with a gentleman who had had long experience in the Orient, and he told me that European competitors of ours had a definite advantage by reason of the fact that they had financial institutions that were operating in the Orient under charter from their respective Governments, and that they were able to utilize much money deposited by the natives of those sections of the country; that the natives knew about the Federal Government of the United States and of the national Governments of our several competitors, and that they would have confidence in the efficiency of our National Government's supervision.

This is merely indicative, of course, of the probable advantage of the "national" feature.

With regard to this bill, I want to congratulate the committee for having proposed such legislation to the Congress of the United States at this particular time. The financial relationships of the world are so interdependent that no great country can prosper with a large section of the world not prospering. If we are to sell our wares to other countries, they must be able to purchase ours in exchange. That is fundamental. This is not a theory; this is a condition which confronts us. We know that Europe is exhausted in so far as ready credit is concerned. In order for us to prosper in the United States we must put into operation the stagnant commercial and industrial possibilities of Europe. That is all there is to it. There is but one way to do this, and that is to extend to them that sort of credit which will enable them to put their productive machinery into operation. This sort of bill tends in that direction.

Now, those of us who have been watching the conditions in this country know what effect it has had upon our internal affairs when there has been a blockade, when our ships could not move from our ports. But unless some such legislation as this is passed in which the people have confidence, so that they will supply the money, our ships can not leave our ports with cargoes, because nobody on the other side can give us anything in exchange. If this bill is a good bill, then we ought to put into it not only those regulations which are necessary to justify public confidence, but the bill ought to be so worded that the people who have money to invest in these debentures will have the highest degree of confidence in their investment. We are not charged here merely with the obligation of protecting the individual investor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We are dealing with an economic situation which affects every man engaged in any productive activity in the United States. It is not only desirable but highly important that the investors shall know, and that it shall be a fact, that there will be that degree of Federal supervision and control of these institutions which will justify this confidence.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman know that there are no provisions in the bill for the protection of the public in reference to investment bankers?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not agree with the gentleman in regard to his conclusion as to the effect of the bill.

Mr. KING. I should like to have him point out where there is any protection against the investment banker.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. In the fraction of a minute which I have remaining I can not take up that question but before the bill is concluded I shall be very glad to speak on that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

In addition to the arguments that have been presented in regard to the retention of this word "Federal," which is something to identify it with the Government of the United States, I want to point out the fact that besides the business that is being done in the United States by these corporations, they are in all probability going to do business in all countries of the world, and in those other countries they will come in direct competition with institutions organized in many instances by the Governments of the countries in which these banks will compete, and because of that fact the keenest competition undoubtedly will arise. Therefore I think it is little enough to do for these institutions that are to be controlled and operated by private capital, that we say to the countries of the world that they are under the supervision of the Federal Government. For that reason, in addition to the other reasons advocated, I say we should retain the word "Federal."

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. This amendment says:

And no other financial corporation hereafter organized under any law other than an act of Congress—shall do thus and so. Does that mean that no corporation could be organized under a State law which used the word "Federal" in its title?

Mr. McFADDEN. That is what it means.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question with reference to the fine proposed by this amendment. Ten dollars a day, if the word "Federal" has any value at all, is almost a foolishly small penalty to impose on a man who is seeking to wrong somebody.

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman wants to make it $25 a day, I will accept the amendment.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Why not make it $100 a day?

Mr. PLATT. Because I do not think it is necessary to make it so high.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Why not make it $50?

Mr. PLATT. Why not make it a million dollars?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. That would be foolish.

Mr. PLATT. Somebody might inadvertently violate the law, and this would restrain them. I do not think it is necessary to make a high fine. Why not make it what the gentleman first suggested—$25 a day?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Why not make it "not less than"?

Mr. PLATT. No; if the gentleman will offer an amendment to make it $25, I will accept it.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment proposed by the committee by striking out the figures "$10," in line 2, on page 3, and inserting in lieu thereof "$25."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. EVANS of Nebraska to the committee amendment: Page 3, line 2, strike out "$10" and insert in lieu thereof "$25."

Mr. PLATT. The committee will accept that amendment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak particularly in reference to the committee amendment inserting the word "Federal." I quite agree with the committee as to the advantage of requiring this designation in the name of all these banks. I think we ought to have something throughout the world to show that these institutions have been authorized by the Government of the United States. We ought not only to do that, but we should let the public throughout the world know that while we do not guarantee these institutions we surround them with every precaution through inspection and other safeguards, so that people will not lose any money. Why should Congress authorize the establishment of these institutions if the Government is not to stand back of them in some way to protect depositors? If we oppose putting the word "Federal" in because it might be construed to be a Government institution, then we had better not authorize their organization. The only thing done is that it designates that the United States Government has authorized the establishment of these banks.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. We have under the authorization of Congress established branch banks throughout the world; have they been failures because they did not have the word "Federal"?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman think they would have been more successful if they had had the word "Federal"?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think they would. I do not think any bank has taken advantage of that except the National City Bank of New York. But what we want to do is to make it easier to do business throughout the world. In the Philippines we authorized the issue of bonds, and when it came up we said that we were not back of the bonds and Congress largely turned down the provision in the bill regarding the independence of the Philippines because people who purchased the bonds thought the United States Government was back of those bonds because it had authorized their issuance by the Philippines, and the people opposed the full independence owing to these bonds. Now, the United States is authorizing the establishment of these banks, and certainly the people of the world will think the United States is back of them. If we are to be in that position, we ought to get the advantage of it by giving them some designation which will show that the United States, the richest country in the world, means to back up these institutions, just as she does her national banks, by every necessary regulation for their soundness and success.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman think that the United States ought to be back of the institutions and ought to be liable?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; it ought not to be liable; but they ought to have such oversight and inspection as will say to the people that they will not lose any money.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit me, the gentleman's argument is that we should put the word "Federal" into these charter names in order to make the people think that the Government is behind them?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; but I say that Congress ought not to authorize them if it is ashamed to put its name into the organization.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of the hundred or more business organizations that Congress has issued or granted charters to that does not put the Government behind them.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Let me give you a concrete example. Maryland authorized the establishment of a bank at Camp Meade. They did not have capital enough to carry it on. The soldiers put their money in that bank; the bank could not meet its obligations and had to close its doors. The financial people of Maryland came forward and subscribed enough money to lend to that bank so that every soldier and every depositor got every dollar that he had put into it, and got it promptly. Maryland had not guaranteed the money, but it was authorized as a State bank and Maryland did not want that blot on its fair name. So, individually, they put enough money in the bank to pay every soldier and to pay every creditor. I say that if the United States Government is ashamed of these institutions, then they ought not to authorize them; and if you are not ashamed of them, do not be afraid to put your name in, saying to the people that this Government is exercising supervision, and with its vast resources will see that no money is lost by any failure of our officials doing their duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for one minute in order to ask him a question.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my time be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that when we charter a State bank we call it a State bank, and when we charter a national bank we call it a national bank; and does the gentleman know of any reason why if the Federal Government charters a bank it should not be called a Federal bank? Is it not the custom to have some word to indicate the source of its origin and control?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman is correct. I will further answer the gentleman as I answered the gentleman from North Carolina. If we are ashamed to put our name in the corporations we ought not to establish them, and no State ought to authorize the establishment of a bank unless it is given a supervision and inspection. It ought not to establish a bank if it does not look out for the people who do business with it.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. KING. The gentleman from Maryland stated in the forepart of his remarks something about safeguards thrown about the bill. Does the gentleman know that there are two provisions, one pertaining to banking and the other pertaining to the sale of stock, and that there is no safeguards thrown around the operations in the investment part of the bill?

Mr. LINTHICUM. There ought to be; it is not fair to the public or fair to the world for us to authorize the establishment of banks unless we give them every safeguard by proper legislation.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. There are a good many corporations now incorporated by the States who use the word "Federal." They would continue to use that designation, would they not?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; unless they were prohibited.

Mr. EMERSON. How can you prohibit anything that is already authorized?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman can answer that question as well as I can.

Mr. EMERSON. This bill says "hereafter organized." Now, many other institutions are using the word "Federal," and it seems to me that the word "international" would be better.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, I think that word is too long; I think the word "Federal" is a good deal better.

Mr. Chairman, I am particularly anxious to see a strong, virile American banking system established throughout the world. I do not want any system, however, established in which we have not every confidence and are willing to give it the same degree of support and assistance which we now give to our national banking institutions in the way of inspecting and other safeguards which are thrown around their operations.

I should like to see such a system, carrying the word "Federal" as a part of its charter name, and that this name might bespeak to the peoples of the world wherever the banks are established not alone its business efficiency but likewise its financial soundness.

This Government has no right and Congress has no justification in organizing anything in the way of a financial system to which it is not willing to give not alone its name but likewise its unqualified supervision.

Our fair Government would be sacrificing a great deal if it should allow a system faulty and unsafe to do business with the general public of other lands. One of the great drawbacks to the commercial interests of our country doing business in foreign lands has been the want of American banking facilities.

When we realize that other nations have had their financial institutions established in all the great centers of the globe, and that we have had but few if any, except within the last few years, we can naturally see why our business men have been largely hampered. The present system, where Americans are compelled to transact their affairs in foreign cities, is slow and tortuous in the extreme. I have seen long lines of Americans trying to arrange some financial matters, both in London and in Paris, where every facility for quick dispatch of business should be provided.

I want to see the prowess of America established in financial matters in all the great centers of the globe. Her banking institutions and her business facilities should be as well known as the great feats performed by our soldiers and sailors in the late war. The people expect much of this country, rich in natural resources and vast wealth, rich in energy and perseverance, a people who do things and do them quickly. I am glad to see that at last we are providing some financial system by which our people may transact financial matters with American institutions in foreign lands.

I want at the same time to see this system so established just as sound as congressional provision and department regulations can possibly make it. This kind and no other should be established by a nation of our magnitude and importance.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a pro forma amendment, to see if I understand the bill at this point. This authorizes the formation of these corporations. We have also authorized by law the formation of the Federal reserve bank and all of the national banks. But we police them. You can not organize a national bank unless the capital is paid in. We restrict their discounts. You send around to examine every one of them. There is a small army of national-bank examiners, and we have had some experience with the present comptroller. There is a responsibility that lies with every stockholder of a national bank, in the event that the bank goes to the wall, in that he shall contribute the equivalent of his stock. That means something. I am glad that we have the national-banking system, although I am somewhat sorry that the Federal reserve bank has, in a measure, disabled all of the country banks. The great city banks make large dividends, but the country national bank is very fortunate if it can bear its burdens and get 7 or 8 per cent—some of them not so well as that. There is responsible supervision of the national banks, and there are not many failures because they are policed.

Oh, my friend said, "Do you want the Government to be behind these banks created under this bill if it becomes law?" The Government is not behind them unless it is a moral obligation, and that I apprehend would not be respected. The name "Federal" means what? That we will examine these banks? Is there anything in this bill—and I ask for information—that these banks are to be examined?

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. There is a provision for examination.

Mr. CANNON. I am very glad of it. Are they to be examined monthly or yearly or how?

Mr. PLATT. Not less than once a year.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. KING. It may be well to inquire what kind of an examination it is, whether the examination goes to these stocks or bonds or simply to an examination of their accounts?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely—as to their assets, and all that kind of thing, and as to whether they are straining their credit unduly.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. I want to ask a few questions for information.

Mr. STEVENSON. The provision on page 13 of the bill is that——

> Every such corporation shall make reports to the Federal Reserve Board at such times and in such form as it may require, and shall be subject to examination once a year and at such other times as may be deemed necessary by the Federal Reserve Board by examiners appointed by the Federal Reserve Board—

That is exactly the provision made as to national banks. Suppose the Federal Reserve Board finds that the same ought to be wound up. Is there any provision to wind it up?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; in the event of insolvency.

Mr. CANNON. In the event of insolvency, yes. Of course if they are insolvent a receiver should be appointed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The provision with reference to examination and the provision with reference to the appointment of a receiver winding up the affairs of the bank are identical with the provisions of that kind in respect to national banks.

Mr. PHELAN. If the gentleman will yield for just a moment, there is a very broad power given in this bill, just as a similar power is given in the national banking act. On page 12, at line 4, the bill provides that should any corporation organized under the act violate or fail to comply with any of the provisions of the section all of its rights, privileges, and franchises derived therefrom shall be forfeited. If the examiner finds a bad condition, the Federal Reserve Board, through that power alone, has the right to say to the banks, "You do so and so, get your bank into right condition or we will see that your franchise is forfeited." That is the control they have.

Mr. CANNON. Very good so far.

Mr. KING. And would the gentleman permit me to inject a suggestion before he resumes?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; although I expect I shall have to ask for some more time, but I am seeking information.

Mr. KING. To the effect that these securities issued by these banks may go under their name or without any liability on their part.

Mr. PLATT. This is tied up all the way through with approval by the Federal Reserve Board. There is a provision for examination and for every sort of safeguard there possibly could be. In fact, the only question is whether we have not placed so many in that it will hamper the banks.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. I notice in the newspapers that the Morgans have negotiated a loan of $250,000,000 to Poland. I suppose they have the power to do that under the law as it now is. I do not object to Poland, but that means that $250,000,000, I presume, without any personal responsibility of the Morgans, will be put upon our market. We have the Monroe doctrine. We are not going to let anybody interfere in the New World with force. They can not come in and take possession. England tried it, you know, and she was checked by Cleveland, and very properly so. Then Roosevelt had something to do with Germany. They frankly said, "These revolutionary governments are overthrown, and they have issued their bonds and our citizens hold them," and they insisted on their rights. What was the alternative? They said to us then, "You take possession," and we got possession of Haiti, and we have possession of one or two of the Central American States—doing what? Keeping law and order and collecting the revenues, and in Haiti running the Government and paying a part of the funds to the creditors. Is there anything in this bill that touches a situation of that kind either morally or legally?

I do not know, if one of these banks were to break and millions of securities were worthless, the query is, Would you not have a little hell raised over here? Would not the various representatives in Congress, the constituencies that send them here, say, "Oh, they were authorized under a Federal law." Morally we are bound. You know we are going a great way "morally" now. We are regulating the world. Well, it is a pretty big job, and I do not know when it touches us in this country, why, then, we can get at Congress. Now I do not know, I am not prepared to say this bill should not pass, but just as a poor fellow, substantially poor, I was just wondering what might happen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. PLATT. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 38, noes 2.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fourth. The amount of its capital stock and the number of shares into which the same shall be divided.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PLATT. These are all parts of one paragraph. Should they not all be read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks each constitutes a paragraph and should be so considered.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I will direct his attention to paragraph (a), page 5, and paragraph (c), on page 6, which will give him the authority that these corporations have in reference to securities that they may purchase and hold, and then he can answer his own question with reference to the class of securities that can be held by the corporations. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will suggest this: I did not intend to discuss that question, but I simply wanted to call the attention of the gentleman to those provisions of the bill. Still I will say this in passing about that question before I pass from it: That there is not any more danger from this law than under the present existing law of hell being raised if somebody in this country has a financial interest in China or anywhere else. In China hell has been raised before because our commercial interests were affected over there, and I anticipate hell will always be raised when our citizens are interested in any country, whether that interest is controlled by a banking corporation, a manufacturing concern, or an individual citizen. I have always frankly said that a country that will not protect its citizenship and their property rights where they are lawfully engaged in business is not worthy of existence, and I for one believe in this Government protecting the lawful interests of its citizens wherever they are. [Applause.] I want to say about this bill, which I intended to say when debate was cut off, that I am frank to say that the use of the word "Federal" is not advisable. It is difficult for the committee to select a word, but I think we ought to have some definite word, and my preference would be "foreign finance corporation." If I had my way about it, I would vote for a general statute that would prohibit the words "United States," "National," "Federal," or any other such words being used by any private corporation that may mislead the unwary to believe that the United States Government has something to do with it other than control by way of supervision and investigation.

Now, these corporations can advertise in foreign countries. They are organized under the laws of the Congress. If an amendment is offered on this floor to put in this bill the same provision we put in the War Finance Corporation bill that the United States Government shall not be liable for any obligation of any of these corporations, and, furthermore, make it a penal offense for any agent of one of these corporations in the sale of its stock or in any transaction to hold out that the United States Government is back of it, I am in favor of voting for such a provision, and I think it will be wise to do it. We are simply establishing machinery and we are recognizing that it may carry great control over the finance and trade of the United States, and we subject it to Federal control and Federal inspection like we do the national banks, but beyond that I would not like the United States to be held liable in any way.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, there is no such statement in the law that authorizes the organization of national banks, and why should there be in the other?

Mr. WINGO. There is this difference, if the gentleman will permit, which I think he will recognize. When we originally organized the national banks—the gentleman, of course, knows the purpose for which they were really organized; that they were for governmental purposes—they issued notes and the National Government undertook to redeeem them. We now have those notes outstanding and will have for at least 25 years, unless we change the law, and the United States Government has got an interest in them, and the word "national" should be protected there, so far as banking corporations are concerned. But these are going to be private corporations. We are going to undertake only to supervise and control so that the public will not be injured, and I do not believe that we should hold out to the unwary here or abroad that the United States Government is responsible for any of their transactions. It is not necessary in order to do what we want to do here, and I hope the conferees, when they come to pass upon this provision between the House and the Senate, will get some other word that will not hold out the idea to anyone that the United States Government is responsible for the debts of this corporation. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sixth. The fact that the certificate is made to enable the persons subscribing the same, and all other persons, firms, companies, and corporations, who or which may thereafter subscribe to or purchase shares of the capital stock of such corporation, to avail themselves of the advantages of this section.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am very anxious to answer certain arguments made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], and I desire to make a connected statement and not make it under the five-minute rule to paragraphs. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WINGO. I hope the gentleman from New York will not object. I think it is better that he proceed now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, in further answer to the suggestion pointed out by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] at the beginning of this debate and certain references made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], I wish to say:

Take the £10,000 illustration several times repeated by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Briefly it is this: A Manchester spinner needs cotton. On good English securities he borrows in England £10,000 and asks that the bank give him a draft on New York. It is done, and the proceeds of the draft in New York are $41,500. If we had this international bank that is proposed by the Edge bill this buyer would take his securities to it and get $48,600, and thus be enabled to pay 6 cents per pound more for cotton. Now, the pith of the matter is, Who is going to hold the securities? That is, who is going to furnish the money that pays for the cotton? The cotton farmer is pleased at the prospect; but will he take these securities in payment? The wheat farmer looks favorably on the proposition; but will he take these debentures based on foreign securities as pay for his wheat?

Will you cotton Members and wheat Members propose to your people that they sell their products for foreign securities?

This plan of payment, to succeed, must sell these foreign securities in America. As Mr. Redfield said, the debentures must be made in denominations small enough to reach all classes, and a gigantic campaign must be launched to sell them. That is, this international bank would be conducting a selling campaign similar to a Liberty bond campaign, for it is estimated that these debentures will run into the billions of dollars.

If it is now clear just what is intended and just how a few $2,000,000 corporations expect to enable Americans to pay themselves for the goods they ship to Europe, let us in a few paragraphs place another indisputable proposition within easy reach.

A fair business transaction is an exchange of equal values. Of course, each party to the trade prefers the value that he is getting; but when the parties are satisfied, we conclude that the trade was fair and the monetary value of what each gave equals what he got. It may be that the exchange is not completed in a short time. Thus one party may deliver goods and take a promissory note of the other, which note merely evidences the fact that the exchange will be completed at a time set. The exchange may be of commodities for money, commodities for commodities, service for service, and so forth; but the point is, the sum of what a man gives in trade must equal what he gets. I knew a southern cotton planter who rented 15 acres of land to a tenant. The planter was to advance feed, food, and clothing to the tenant while the crop was being made, and the tenant was to pay rent for the land, as well as for goods advanced when the crop was gathered. At the end of the year the tenant had made four bales of cotton, which at 8 cents per pound, the price then, amounted to $160. His bill amounted to $200, or $40 more than his crop. The planter took his note for the balance and they planned to make an extra good crop the next year. The season was bad, however, and a new note for $125 was given. Finally the debt became so large that it could not be paid. This merely represents a kind of business transaction that is not a fair exchange. The two parties did not give and exchange equally.

This, then, is the second proposition: In fair, satisfactory business between nations, the exports of any nation plus all services of all kinds which it renders to other nations equals the sum of its imports and the services it receives at the hands of other nations.

For seven years before the war, 1907–1913, inclusive, we exported an average of $2,000,000,000 worth of goods annually, and we imported one and one-half billions annually, leaving an annual balance in our favor of $500,000,000. This $500,000,000 we received in services, the main items of which were ocean freights, premiums on insurance in foreign countries, bills by American tourists abroad, interest on foreign-owned American securities, and foreign labor in our industries.

Thus the proposition is illustrated in a plain, concrete way right in our own national experience.

One more phase of the matter needs a clear statement before the main issue becomes clear. We have just illustrated the working of the rule that the services rendered in commercial transactions must equal the services received. Let us now apply the proposed international banking procedure to the situation in which we find ourselves.

What exports are we making annually? More than five billions average annually from the beginning of 1914 to the end of 1919, estimating the last half of 1919 as equal to the first six months. The exports for the first six months of 1919 were nearly four and three-fourths billions. What services do we render that we must be paid for annually? That is, what do foreign nations owe us for things other than goods shipped them? First, they owe us annually 5 per cent on $10,000,000,000 loaned them through our Government. That is one-half of a billion dollars annually in interest. Second, they owe us at least 5 per cent on $6,000,000,000 of private debt. This means that the foreign nations owe us annually five billions for goods, one-half billion for interest on the governmental debt of ten billions, three-tenths billion for interest on the private debt of six billions, or an annual sum of five and eight-tenths billions. Now, what do they pay us annually? First, we have imported an annual average of less than two and one-half billions for the six years 1914 to 1919, inclusive, estimating for last half of 1919. The imports for the first half of 1919 were less than one and three-fourths billions, or three billions less than the exports for the six months.

What will we owe these foreign nations now as interest on American investments which they hold? Certainly much less than we paid annually before the war, for they traded back many of those securities during the war. What will we owe them for ocean tonnage, for insurance, for foreign labor? Certainly much less than before the war, even allowing for increased fees on tonnage. On foreign travel alone we expect a substantial increase. On all these items we owed foreigners before the war annually about one-half billion dollars. For our present purpose we will certainly be fair to our opponents if we say that foreign nations may be owed by us annually three-fourths billion dollars to cover these items. Thus what we owe others annually would seem to amount to two and one-half billions for imports and three-fourths billion for sundry services mentioned, or three and one-fourth billions total.

As already figured, they owe us on this six-year average five and eight-tenths billions. We owe them three and one-fourth billions. Strike a balance and you have slightly over two billions of an unpaid annual balance. This two billions annually is what is to be paid by the sale of foreign securities in America. Thus each year the unpaid balance mounts by two billions, until at the end of five years foreign nations would owe us not less than $30,000,000,000. (The two billions would compound.)

My first question is, How do the proponents of this scheme expect these debentures to be paid? One of the arguments put forth is that this plan makes possible the achievement of our ambitions in foreign trade; but that only means that we shall continue to export more than we import, which does not permit payment of the debentures. In some reasonable time these nations must pay the securities in services. How do you expect it to be done? Name the service; name the goods. It can not be done except by the foreign trade of the United States sinking to the point where the sum of our imports and services received is greater than the sum of the exports and services rendered, and all our plans are laid to prevent this thing.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the gentleman's amendment.

I have listened to the gentleman's statement with a good deal of interest, and I think it is the clearest recital of facts to show the necessity for this bill that I have heard. Now, let us get down to earth and see what it is here that is presented by the gentleman, and meet it. He calls attention to the fact, which all of us know, that prior to the war Europe could settle her balances that she owed us by the interest that we owed her on American securities that she held, by the foreign trade, tourists going over there, and other items that he mentioned. But whereas they could do that before the war, where do we stand now? Instead of Europe holding our securities by the billions and taking the interest upon those securities and meeting the trade balance due us each year, we find that just the contrary is true. We find that all these Governments owe us billions. Why is it that England and France and the other allies can not pay this Government now? For the same reason that the cotton tenant that he referred to could not pay, because he did not have any money. Now, let us take the illustration the gentleman from Illinois and the farmers in his district would appreciate. Suppose there is a tenant of a corn planter out there, and that the man has been sick or he has had a fire that has wiped out all of his assets. That would be similar to the European situation. He goes to this man and says, "I owe you, but I have not anything with which to pay you." The man says, "Here is a piece of land over here; you go to work and pay me." "But," he replies, "I can not live; I have not any tools. I can not keep my family while making the crop. I can give you a note or give you a mortgage, and if I have any stock, I will give it on the stock." The man says, "The bank will not take it, but I can give you the liquid credits that are necessary to buy the feed and buy the tools and buy the food for your family. Then, when you produce the wealth out of the soil, you can pay me." And that is the way Europe has got to pay us. If I had my way to-day, I would make England pay us to-morrow, and make all the rest of them do it, but we are face to face with the cold-blooded business proposition that they have not the money with which to pay us nor any short-time credits with which to buy the raw material that is necessary for them to resume work so as to make the money to pay us. What do they want from us? They want copper, they want steel, they want corn, they want cotton, they want wheat, they want the raw materials necessary to build up their country and the food with which to feed their families while they are producing some wealth to pay what they owe us already, and also to make us richer in the future by expanding our great commerce and international trade.

The cotton farmer alone is not interested. His interest is fixed because his acreage is fixed on which it is possible to grow his cotton. But, answer me: Where is the man within the sound of my voice that can point to the limit of the American manufacturer if we have the markets of the world? Instead of deploring the condition, we ought to stand erect and proud because the unfortunate circumstances of this World War have made us absolute financial and commercial masters of the nations of the world. They have got to come to us for raw materials and on our own terms. What do we propose? Not out of any altruism to them, but in order to enable the man that owes us to make the crop and build business in the future, we say, "We will set up the machinery that will turn your long-term credit, the only one you have, into current credit and cash."

The gentleman from Illinois asks if the cotton grower or the wheat grower is going to take these long-term credits. Oh, no; they are not going to take them. How is the corn grower of Illinois going to sell the corn to Europe? They can not take the bonds of those Governments or their long-term credits. Do we propose to go into a paternalistic scheme? To undertake to handle this business the United States Government, while exercising a supervision over it, lets these private institutions of the country do it, and the duty that we owe to the corn farmer of Illinois is to let them set up the machinery that will convert these long-term credits into immediate cash in order to maintain the prosperity of the corn farmer of Illinois. [Applause.]

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I believe I had a few minutes left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had five minutes. He reserved it, though.

Mr. KING. Yes; I reserved it for myself, Mr. Chairman, mentally. [Laughter.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KING. I will.

Mr. McFADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he is in favor of selling the products of the farms and the factories of the United States to the world?

Mr. KING. I certainly am in favor of export trade.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman——

Mr. KING. But I am not in favor of certain individuals in this country operating a scheme whereby the farmers, mechanics, and everybody else throughout the Middle West, who produce the stock and produce farm products, must buy all these securities in order to pay for their own stuff. That is what they will have to do.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman outline something definite?

Mr. KING. Where will the income come from if it does not come out of the pockets of the American people?

Mr. McFADDEN. Has the gentleman any plan to finance these exports?

Mr. KING. Well, I am an humble member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, perhaps the only layman on the committee, speaking, as I am trying to speak, from the layman's standpoint. Therefore I feel the difficulty of contesting with the committee. There is a fetich in this House to the effect that you must not attack the report of a committee. All that I am trying to do is to suggest these matters to the Members of the House and try to get them to consider the provisions of this bill.

Further answering the position of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], it is important to understand that England's position is not ours.

It is well at that point to note this: England's position regarding foreign trade is not ours. We are the only Nation that is really great in exports of raw materials and in manufactured articles. England bought our railroad and other securities, and we annually sent her cotton and wheat to pay the interest. What are you needing from England that will pay the interest on the money that she owes us? Nothing. All we buy from England will not balance what we sell her, and thus the interest item is unsettled. Germany created credits and aided her merchants and manufacturers on the same principle that England does. When she invested money in foreign lands it was calculated to bring her raw materials. Thus she was paid the interest on the investment in raw materials from the undeveloped country where the investment was made. But this proposition is mainly to make investments in countries where raw materials are scarce and where industry is highly developed, which manifestly means the breaking down of your own industries. You pay yourselves for your own cotton and send it to them in order that they may manufacture and sell it in competition with your own mills.

But when 10 years have rolled around and these foreign securities in private hands have sunk to the same plane that foreign exchange has now sunk with our great banking institutions it will begin to occur to people in America that it would be a good thing to buy up these securities and move to some European country where the goods of the issuing country can be had for the securities. That is the way we can get service and goods for these securities. Using Mr. STEVENSON's illustration right now, $41,500 in America equals $48,600, or £10,000 in England. Therefore any American who contemplates transferring his citizenship to England can now transfer his investments at a nice profit.

That is the only way the debentures, based on foreign securities, will be paid in the next hundred years. It is really marvelous how the proponents of this bill have accepted the miraculous powers this international bank is supposed to have. It seems perfectly natural to them that the thing which is now worth $41,500 in this country would immediately be worth $48,600 under the magic of this bill, and the cotton planter and the wheat farmer would get it all. This is not irony. This is not sarcasm. Far be it from an attempt at wit or humor. Irony, sarcasm, and wit are all right in their place, but they prove nothing, and they have no place in such a serious discussion. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] says "if we have these institutions so that he could come here and get his money by putting up the same securities he puts up in England he could pay 6 cents per pound more for his cotton than he can under the present arrangement, and on 11,000,000 bales of cotton in the United States that would mean $330,000,000 to the people of America who market the cotton."

Now, if you will remember that this $330,000,000 was borrowed from American fellow citizens whose security is foreign stock and bonds (stocks in iron furnaces that are running in competition with our own; bonds on cotton mills that are running in competition with those of the Piedmont Plateau and the cotton regions, as well as the mills of New England), the payment for which will not be made in two generations except the holders expatriate themselves, you will agree that there was not much ground for applause on the $330,000,000 argument. But that is only a small part. Mr. STEVENSON figures the cotton crop in terms of his new plan, failing, as all have failed, to examine into the mystery of just how this bank would make the money come—that is, the sale of foreign securities to Americans. This I will now do. First, note that Mr. STEVENSON figures on the whole crop—11,000,000 bales, as if the English bought it all. Since, as a fact, the English do not buy it all, but about half of it is used at home. Mr. STEVENSON's plan is to have the American people buy foreign securities so as to raise the price of cotton 6 cents, thus paying the cotton farmers 41 cents per pound for their cotton and raising the price of cotton goods to our own 100,000,000 people accordingly. But for half of the cotton crop how many billions of dollars worth of foreign securities must our Americans buy? A bale of cotton at 41 cents per pound amounts to $205. The entire crop of 11,000,000 is worth $2,255,000,000. Half of this is one billion and, say, one hundred and twenty-five millions. That is, according to Mr. STEVENSON's method, which was applauded, the investing American public would have to buy foreign securities to the amount of more than $1,000,000,000 annually in order to finance the cotton crop alone. Think it over.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The persons signing the organization certificate shall duly acknowledge the execution thereof before a judge of some court of record or notary public, who shall certify thereto under the seal of such court or notary, and thereafter the certificate shall be forwarded to the Federal Reserve Board to be filed and preserved in its office. Upon duly making and filing articles of association and an organization certificate the association shall become and be a body corporate, and as such and in the name designated therein shall have power under such conditions and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe to adopt and use a corporate seal, which may be changed at the pleasure of its board of directors; to have succession for a period of 20 years unless sooner dissolved by an act of Congress or unless its franchises become forfeited by some violation of law; to make contracts; to sue and be sued, complain, and defend in any court of law or equity; to elect or appoint directors, all of whom shall be citizens of the United States; and, by its board of directors, to appoint such officers and employees as may be deemed proper, define their authority and duties, require bonds of them, and fix the penalty thereof; dismiss such officers or employees, or any thereof, at pleasure and appoint others to fill their places; to prescribe, by its board of directors, by-laws not inconsistent with law or with the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board regulating the manner in which its stock shall be transferred, its directors elected or appointed, its officers and employees appointed, its property transferred, and the privileges granted to it by law exercised and enjoyed.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 4, line 1, after the word "certificate," insert "and after the Federal Reserve Board has approved the same and issued a permit to begin business."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 5, page 4, after the word "power," strike out "under such conditions and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 9, after the word "dissolved," insert "by the act of the shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock or."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following committee amendment on page 4, line 18: Strike out the semicolon and insert a comma, so as to make the reading comport with the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 18, strike out the semicolon and insert a comma.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, what does the gentleman think about the word "and" between "them" and "fix"? Should not that go out also? What does the gentleman from New York think about that?

Mr. PLATT. We have discussed that. I do not think it is necessary to take that out.

Mr. WINGO. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, if it is not too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. KING. Not having had time to finish my answer to the suggestions of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], I desire to proceed for five minutes.

These calculations take into account all crops, all commodities, all services, going and coming, and show the net result that would have to be settled by this credit system.

A superficial understanding of the bill will not do. If these facts could be brought home to Congress, I believe it would at least delay the matter until it had been examined more exhaustively. My examination has concerned itself with the inevitable mathematics of the situation. Suppose you figure on the effect produced on our Americans by having $15,000,000,000 of foreign securities distributed throughout our land. You would not have many 100 per cent Americans. I read in a book called the Bible, "Where a man's treasure is, there will his heart be also." This book has impressed me very much, and I believe this saying. This point alone is infinite in its possibilities.

Again we have started a "buy-a-home" campaign. It is grand. It will absorb the savings and small investments of the mass of our people for years. It means 100 per cent Americanism. Do not forget that this bank is going after the small-moneyed man—the many of them. The big ones have all they want now. They will give only $4.15 for a pound sterling. Therefore the present proposition is, "Do not invest your money in a home, invest it in a good debenture founded on English bonds, French stocks," and so forth. Think of the substitution for foreign securities for "own your own home." Again this is merely a test. There is enough in it for a book each page of which is a ringing plea for Americanism.

How to take care of our industry and promote happy, wholesome, prosperous living among our people is not along these lines. This line means work and slave for foreigners. Work hard! Produce more! See how much you can ship across the seas! See what fun it is to pay yourselves for the goods you give to others!

In the readjustment I would direct the attention of our people to the problem of what to produce for ourselves and how to promote life among Americans. We have stinted ourselves for years and worked hard that others might not starve. It is now time for us to direct our attention to what shall be done for ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Each corporation so organized shall have power, under such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe:

(a) To purchase, sell, discount, and negotiate, notes, drafts, checks, bills of exchange, acceptances, including bankers' acceptances, cable transfers, and other evidences of indebtedness; to purchase and sell securities including the obligations of the United States or of any State thereof; to accept bills or drafts drawn upon it subject to such limitations and restrictions as the Federal Reserve Board may impose; to issue letters of credit; to purchase and sell, exchange, coin and bullion; to borrow and to lend money on real or personal security; and generally to exercise such powers as are incidental to the powers conferred by this act or as may be usual, in the determination of the Federal Reserve Board, in connection with the transaction of the business of banking or other financial operations in the countries, colonies, dependencies, or possessions in which it shall transact business and not inconsistent with the powers specifically granted herein.

With committee amendments, as follows:

Page 5, line 5, after the word "negotiate," on line 4, insert "with or without its indorsement or guaranty."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 8, after the word "sell," insert the words "with or without its indorsement or guaranty."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 10, after the words "thereof," insert "but not including shares of stock in any corporation except as herein provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 14, after the word "sell," strike out the words "exchange, coin and bullion" and insert "coin, bullion, and exchange."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 16, after the word "money," strike out the words "on real or personal security" and insert "to issue debentures, bonds, and promissory notes under such limitations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, but in no event having liabilities outstanding thereon at any one time exceeding ten times its capital stock and surplus."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. The committee amendment authorizes the corporation to issue debentures, bonds, and promissory notes under such limitations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, and so on.

As I understand, it was the purpose of the Committee on Banking and Currency to throw such safeguards around this bill and to make such amendments to it as would protect the country in every way possible. Yet the committee have introduced an amendment here which very greatly enlarges the power of this corporation. Under the Senate bill the corporation had no power to issue bonds or debentures.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MORGAN. I have but little time.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman can get additional time.

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield.

Mr. WINGO. There is nothing strange in this. Does not this authorize the corporation to do what ordinary business and banking corporations do? Suppose they got the securities of some concern in Belgium. The public in the United States would not know anything about that institution. Now, they put those securities in trust and issue their own debentures against them, and the people of the United States can understand them and appraise their value. Is there anything wrong with that?

Mr. MORGAN. I understand the proposition. Now, a national bank has no right to issue debentures and bonds.

Mr. PHELAN. That is a question, whether they have or have not; but if we had not put this provision in the bill, the probabilities are that they would have the right to do this anyway, and eminent counsel are of that opinion. For my own part, I would have preferred to leave this section out of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not said I was opposed to the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Let me suggest to the gentleman along the line of what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] has stated, that as a matter of fact the best legal opinion is that if we do not specifically make this authorization, the corporation would by necessary implication have the right to issue debentures and to issue their promissory notes. So, we have undertaken to limit their right by specifying what they can do, so that under the rule of interpretation established by the courts, where we give them the right to do a certain thing and specify it, then they are limited to that. So it is a limitation and a safeguard.

Mr. STEAGALL. There is this further limitation: Whereas in the original bill the Federal Reserve Board was the only restraining authority with reference to the obligations to be incurred, under this amendment they are specifically limited to ten times the amount of their capital stock.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. This is a very important subject and I have been very liberal in allowing interruptions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNBAR. I want to ask the gentleman if he will yield so that I may submit an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I can not yield just now, but I will be glad to yield later if I have the time.

I want to say this, that generally an institution can not issue bonds or debentures without authority; and if there is any question as to whether these corporations could issue debentures without authority, then the Congress should make a specific declaration prohibiting them from issuing bonds and debentures unless expressly authorized so to do. Now, this amendment uses both words, "bonds" and "debentures." I have no doubt the committee has taken some pains to distinguish between those two terms, yet I do not know just why they should use both words, "bonds" and "debentures." Sometimes those words are used interchangeably and are synonymous in that way.

Mr. PLATT. The committee discussed that very point which the gentleman is discussing, and we put in those words simply in order to be specific. Probably the word "debenture" would cover "bond," and probably "bond" would cover "debenture."

Mr. KING. If the gentleman will yield, I will give him Webster's definition.

Mr. MORGAN. I must go ahead, because I do not know that I can get any more time. In some of the French institutions a debenture has no limit as to the time when it is to be paid, and generally debentures are long-time bonds running 40 or 50 years. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee how long is it expected that these bonds or debentures will run?

Mr. PLATT. I do not know how fully that has been discussed. Of course, the board has not taken that up very much, but I think they are to be for only 3 or 4 or 5 years, and that 10 years would be the extreme limit. It is like the life of the average mortgage, I should say.

Mr. MORGAN. Ordinarily in European institutions bonds and debentures run for a long term of years, 40 or 50 or 60 years. I think there ought to be a limitation as to the time these bonds shall run.

I say another thing, that it would be a rare exception for any institution in European countries or in this country to issue bonds or debentures without their being based upon some specific, definite security. It is true that debentures are sometimes issued and their security is the entire assets of the institution, but those institutions are prohibited generally from incumbering their assets.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. MORGAN. I will.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask the gentleman if he knows the reason of the committee for striking out in line 16, on page 5, the words—on real or personal security.

That is right in line with what the gentleman is now discussing.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know. You will notice it says there—to borrow and to lend money.

Under that provision these corporations can borrow any amount of money. Now, if we allow debentures and bonds to be issued, we ought to require them to be based upon such security and issued under such rules and regulations and safeguards as will protect the public.

Under this bill one of these corporations, with a capital of $2,000,000, could issue $20,000,000 of bonds not based on a single security. The gentleman says the idea is that all the debentures will be based on securities, but there is nothing in this bill that requires these banks to put up anything.

There are many reasons for this; debentures will be sold to the public generally. They will go into the hands of everybody; they will go into the general collection of securities in banks everywhere. They ought to go out standardized in some way so that when the public buys them they will know that they are securities under some form of inspection. They will be payable to bearer, and it is a form of circulating medium, a form of inflation. If they go into general circulation and become a circulating medium in the hands of private individuals where any banking institution may own them, they ought to be issued under such terms, limitations, and safeguards as will make them absolutely safe for the protection of individuals and for the protection of the credit of our country, because the failure of one of these institutions is liable to start a panic and bring bankruptcy all over the country. [Applause.] We ought not to allow these organizations to issue bonds and debentures under the limitations which you have prescribed. It is not definite and not comprehensive. Here you allow these corporations to issue bonds and debentures to the amount of ten times the capital and surplus. When we authorized the war finance corporations to issue bonds and debentures, we allowed them to issue to only six times the amount of the capital, specifically and definitely confined, and required them to underlay them with ample security to make the bonds and debentures absolutely safe.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not disagree with the purpose of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] in putting in certain restrictions. In fact, no other member of the committee was more insistent than I in putting certain restrictions in the bill.

But to come to the point of the provision mentioned by the gentleman from Oklahoma as to the issuance of bonds, let me point out that when we got the bill from the Senate it had the general power to borrow and lend money. In the opinion of eminent counsel, and incidentally in the opinion of the lawyers on our committee, the word "borrow" was a very broad word, broad enough to carry with it the power to issue bonds. I think, without any doubt, the power to borrow carries with it the power to issue any kind of obligation whereby they could make the borrowing worth while. How are they going to borrow? Suppose we give them the power to borrow. How is the corporation going to borrow unless it gives the party from whom it borrows evidence of the debt? It can not borrow without giving some writing or paper or certificate of some description, and naturally the way for a corporation to borrow is on a note or a debenture or bond. So if we had nothing here but the power to borrow, I think there is not the slightest doubt that the corporation, with the simple authority and power to borrow, could issue notes, debentures, and bonds. Without the power to issue notes, debentures, and bonds they are almost without the power to borrow, and so it is plain that the power to borrow includes the other powers.

Some members of the committee wanted to put it in to make sure that such power was granted, and, more than that, other members of the committee, and I think the entire membership of the committee, wanted to put in "debenture bonds and promissory notes," not for the purpose of enlarging the powers of the Senate bill, but to put certain limitations on the issue of bonds, debentures, and promissory notes. You will find in the language in italics that we limit the extent to which they can borrow. It is not simply limited to ten times the amount of the capital and surplus, but under such limitations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, but in no event to exceed ten times the amount of the capital and surplus. In other words, if the Federal Reserve Board so decides under the limitations, then they can make it five or four or two times the amount of the capital and surplus.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask the gentleman why the bill was amended in lines 15 and 16 granting the power to borrow money on real and personal security, which, I take it, means you can not borrow over 75 per cent on real or personal property? Then you turn around and say that they can issue bonds, debentures, and promissory notes under such liabilities as may be prescribed and give them the power to borrow ten times the security that they may be able to show up.

Mr. PHELAN. Not ten times the amount of security they show up.

Mr. JUUL. Ten times the amount of capital stock and surplus if the Federal authorities will permit. What was the committee's reason for striking out real and personal security, which among laymen is considered the best security possible?

Mr. PHELAN. I have not the slightest objection to their going out or staying in. I do not think it makes the slightest difference. You have the power to borrow and lend money, and that carries with it the power to take real and personal security. It is one of the implied powers. As long as those broad words are used you must give the corporation all the incidental powers that come under the scope of the words used.

Mr. JUUL. I thought the gentleman, being on the committee, knew the reason.

Mr. PHELAN. I think the reason was to eliminate unnecessary words.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 20, after the word "exceeding," strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "six."

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the United States is destined and entitled to become the producer, the manufacturer, and the banker of the world. But under the present existing conditions it can not become so unless the provisions of this act become the law of the land. I do believe, however, that it is necessary for the protection of the investor that this bill be amended, and particularly in reference to this paragraph to which I have just offered an amendment. I do not believe that the Federal financial corporations about to be organized should be permitted, though they have the authority and the approval of the Federal board, to borrow ten times the amount of their capital stock and their surplus.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman knows that the national banks are allowed to borrow very much more than ten times their capital.

Mr. DUNBAR. National banks are, perhaps, allowed to borrow much more than ten times their capital and surplus, but the stockholders of national banks are liable for twice the amount of the stock.

Mr. PLATT. There is no limit at all on the amount of deposits, for instance, that may be placed in a national bank.

Mr. DUNBAR. National banks are home institutions. With respect to them we are dealing with home indebtedness, home enterprises. We are dealing with institutions with which we are able to become acquainted, and with whose business we become familiar. For that reason it is necessary that in this act these Federal financial institutions be restricted.

Stockholders in national banks, in the event of failure, are liable to depositors for double the amount of their holdings. In the proposed legislation stockholders are to be made responsible for the amount of their unpaid subscriptions. This is intended to make one security for creditors as against two in the former case. In the act under consideration it is proposed that financial corporations be permitted, under direction of the Federal Reserve Board, to issue debentures, borrow money, and to sell bonds for an amount not to exceed ten times the capital stock and surplus. Borrowed money is to be used to enable capitalists to finance European institutions. Aside from interest paid for borrowed money, profits realized over and above interest paid will be divided among the stockholders. Losses, if they occur, in excess of capital stock and surpluses, must be borne by those who have loaned their money to the corporations, and for this reason, among others, I favor the proposition of permitting corporations under this act to borrow six times the amount of their capital and surplus instead of ten times the amount.

This is a period of unrest. Doing business on credit and making money on borrowed capital is the scheme of the day. Experiences in all times have been that there must be an accounting day, and when this day arrives our house should be in order. Under the proposed legislation a banking house with a capital and surplus amounting to $10,000,000 will have a right under supervision of the Federal Reserve Board to borrow $1,000,000,000 to invest in securities of foreign corporations, most of which to-day admittedly can not otherwise be realized upon and whose solvency is problematic and dependent upon the future. In these days of turmoil and agitation no man can tell what the day may bring forth. The governments of Europe owe more money than they will probably ever be able to pay. Before the World War Great Britain was unable to raise taxes sufficient to pay the expenses of government and the interest on her public debt. It was admitted she never expected to be able to pay the principal, and Englishmen were then the bankers of the world.

There is considerable hazard attending the European and world loans to be made by financial corporations, and those who wish to invest or speculate in European, Asiatic, or African securities should largely do so with their own money and not with other people's money. Under the proposed act these financial corporations are to have exclusive right to use of the word "Federal," which in the minds of the people is synonymous with governmental power, authority, and supervision. For this reason men who wish to engage in adventurous foreign speculation under the sanction and power of our Government may organize a so-called Federal financial corporation, borrow money with consent of the Federal board of directors, hazard all, perhaps make a fortune, which then is their own; but if they lose all in the venture their personal loss would be but one-tenth of the amount speculated, and because of the high esteem in which the Federal reserve bank directors are held, speculators in the name of the Government, patriotism, and humanity would find ready sale for bonds among the people, which bonds might be in denominations of $50 up, and thus by the sanction of the Government innocent holders of small savings as well as trusting people possessing means might lose all. If men are to make or lose money in speculation, let them at least invest one-seventh of the money; six-sevenths is enough for a trusting public to furnish, especially when the men who furnish one-seventh receive all the profits and who if the venture is a failure suffer but one-seventh of all the losses. [Applause.]

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I make this motion for the purpose of obtaining some information from the committee. This bill provides for the incorporation of a bank, and it is to carry the word "federal" as a part of its corporate name. It can only be organized with a capital of at least $2,000,000, so that it is going to be a very large, powerful, influential institution. These banks are authorized to issue promissory notes, to issue bank notes, up to ten times the amount of their capital and surplus. Assuming that the capital is $2,000,000, the bank would be authorized to issue bank notes for $20,000,000.

Mr. PLATT. Oh, that is not so.

Mr. PHELAN. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HUSTED. They are promissory notes, and a bank note is nothing but a promissory note. These institutions are banks, and being banks, their bank notes are promissory notes. I fail to see how any member of the committee can properly say that notes issued under the provisions of this act would not be bank notes. That is exactly what they would be. No other financial institution in this country is permitted to issue bank notes without security. Assume one of these big, powerful institutions should fail, and that it should have outstanding $20,000,000 worth of bank notes which were not secured in any manner whatsoever. What effect would such a failure have upon the credit of this country? What effect would it have upon the other financial institutions of this country? The bill as originally passed by the Senate carried a provision that they could not issue these securities except upon real or personal security. Oh, the bill does provide that they can not issue these notes except under such limitations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, but I do not think that is sufficient. I think we should prescribe in this act beyond peradventure of a doubt, beyond any exercise of discretion by the Federal Reserve Board, that no bank can issue bank notes to the amount of $20,000,000 without any security whatever.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR]. It seems to me that the institutions proposed to be incorporated under this act are somewhat similar to some of the large mortgage guaranty companies, and having had some experience with several of those companies, I take the liberty of explaining in a general way the operation of them, because I think their case fits rather closely the position of the institutions to be organized. These proposed financial institutions, as I understand it, will merely discount the paper of buyers of export material, and will have in their vaults mortgages or some form of security to secure those notes given by the foreign buyers. The concerns will then issue their own evidence of indebtedness to investors; this indebtedness, bear in mind, will be safeguarded by, first, the stability of the issuing institution; second, by the note, backed by some form of property pledge of the foreign merchant or manufacturer. That is exactly how these mortgage companies operate. For instance, here is the Bond & Mortgage Guarantee Co. of New York City, one of the largest mortgage companies in the United States. For example, a man wants to borrow some money on his real estate. The appraiser of the company decides after investigation that the loan is a good one, and the loan is negotiated. The man issues his bond and mortgage and gives it to the mortgage company, who advances the money, and the loan is completed on that side of the transaction. Then the mortgage company sells to an investor in the form of a certificate their guaranty of the mortgage. The investor, when he buys that, buys the guaranty of the mortgage company that they will pay the principal and interest of the mortgage when due. They also give to the investor the assigned mortgage of the man who has made the loan on his property, so that the investor who buys the security has the assigned mortgage plus the guaranty of the mortgage company. The mortgage company charges a fee for guaranteeing the mortgage and guaranteeing the interest, and in addition they look after insurance, taxes, and so forth.

To accommodate small investors, certain mortgages are trusted in some trust company, and against them certificates are issued, each certificate being secured, in addition to the company's guarantee, by its pro rata interest in the mortgages held by the trust company. As I understand this bill, this is largely the plan which will be followed, and the investors will be protected by an assignment of a portion of the securities which will be held against the certificates of indebtedness or bonds issued.

The question arises, and very properly, as to the amount which a company should be allowed to guarantee. Comparison has been made here with national banks, but it does not seem to me that that is a fair comparison. The fair analogy is to compare these corporations with insurance companies, because then they come pretty much under the same provisions. Take these mortgage companies to which I refer. I have just received a telegram from one of them in New York. I asked them for the amount of guarantees they had outstanding in proportion to their capital and surplus. Here is one reply: "We guarantee twenty-three times our capital and surplus outstanding."

Here is another mortgage company on Long Island, of which I happen to be a director, doing the kind of business I have attempted to describe. They limit their guarantees to twenty times their capital and surplus. There is no law in the State of New York as to the amount which an insurance company or a mortgage company can guarantee mortgages or write policies. The mortgage companies have merely adopted 23 per cent in one case and 20 per cent in another as a practical business proposition. It seems to me that these corporations provided for in this bill, when they are allowed to guarantee ten times or sell forms of secured indebtedness ten times their capital and surplus, would be acting conservatively, and that sound business warrants them to do so. Of course in this, as in all business transactions, honesty of purpose and integrity of dealing are the basis of stability.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I will.

Mr. DUNBAR. These financial corporations who sell twenty-three times the amount of their assets are corporations organized admittedly for the purpose of personal enterprise and speculation serving under a corporation. That is the universal opinion admitted, but in the proposed bill we clothe the financial institutions——

Mr. HICKS. I would like to answer a question, but I would hardly like the gentleman to make a speech in my time, as I have something more to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DUNBAR. Pardon me.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes, if I may. I have not spoken on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HICKS. Let me say to my friend from Indiana that business concerns are usually operated for profit, and in this respect these concerns differ from no others.

Mr. Chairman, the necessity of institutions like this seems to me can hardly be questioned. In order to fortify the argument I am going to ask the liberty of reading from a statement made by Mr. Herbert Hoover, who probably is as well versed from personal contact with conditions abroad as any living man, and he stated the matter in an extremely short and very much to the point article. He said:

> Unless something is done to reestablish the credits of the foreign countries in the United States and bring the rate of exchange to somewhere near the normal level, the American manufacturer and farmer will experience the greatest business reversal that the history of the United States has ever known. With the French franc, which previously has been worth about 20 cents, bringing 11 cents, and the English pound greatly depreciated, it is impossible for them to buy. The same thing is true of Italy and other stable Governments. Newly organized Governments can not purchase, because they have no credit. Practically all of the money of the world is centered in the United States. It is here because it was forced to come in order to secure that which was necessary for the war. Unless some of that capital is returned in the form of credits, goods can not follow in the line they have previously taken. We must either say, with equanimity, that we will lose much of the billions of dollars that we have loaned to Europe or must make further extension of credit so that Europe can produce the goods to provide the money to repay us.

Let us remember that not since the Roman Empire has the situation presented itself such as is offered to-day by America. We have concentrated within our Nation both wealth and raw materials. We are the creditor Nation of the world as well as the producer of the world's largest supply of raw materials. If we are to do business with other nations, other nations must do business with us, and by extending credits we will stimulate this international trade.

These institutions to be formed are not only for the purpose of rehabilitating France and Belgium, they are formed not for one nation or one time, but they are formed for all time and for the trade of all nations, South America and Asia as well as for Europe; and it seems to me that unless this country is willing to establish some kind of an institution or institutions which will give credits to countries that need them, we can not expect Europe, for instance, to pay back the debt she owes us; and therefore I am strongly in favor of this provision in the bill and of the bill itself.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Yes; gladly.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman point out, for the benefit of the Committee of the Whole, in what manner this bill will stabilize exchange?

Mr. HICKS. My impression is it stabilizes the exchange in this way, that unless you have France, Belgium, and England—especially France and Belgium, where the depreciated currency is at the lowest ebb—able to sell to the rest of the world, we can not expect exchange to go up, for unless they sell goods the balance of trade will always run against them; and this bill is going to enable France and Belgium to buy the raw material and the machinery and start their manufacturing plants going, so that they can produce stuff which they can sell to South America, China, and other parts of the world and get the money to pay us for loans advanced.

Mr. KING. If they are owing us now a number of billions of dollars, on which the interest charges are $50,000,000 a year, and we continue to send exports and give credit, when will they commence to pay us back so the situation can be turned around?

Mr. HICKS. I will say I talked this morning with one of the French mission, and, in answer to some questions I made along this line—I have not the figures with me—he said that there are 327 factories, as I recall, in France completely or nearly completely reestablished, ready to do business, and now they are seeking raw materials with which to manufacture. By establishing credits, they can begin to turn out goods.

Mr. KING. Are they going to send their goods to us?

Mr. HICKS. They expect to send their goods wherever they can sell them. We do not care where the goods are sent. Our protective tariff, with Republicans in power, will protect us from dumping. What we want is the money that France, Belgium, and England owes us. If they can sell their goods in South America or China and get money and send it to us, that is all we want.

Mr. KING. How long will it take to accomplish this?

Mr. HICKS. It may and probably will take years.

Before taking my seat permit me to quote some exchange rates as of November 3:

Pound sterling, $4.16.
Franc (France), $0.11⅜.
Franc (Belgium), $0.11⅛.
Lire (Italy), $0.09⅜.
Mark (Germany), $0.03¾.
Krone (Austria), $0.01.
Guilder (Holland), $0.38.

Let me also give a few figures as to the war damage in Belgium and France.

BELGIUM.

While the question of material damage is a difficult one to determine, it is estimated roughly that the material damage alone amounts to more than $4,000,000,000. Practically all the important factories, except those owned by German interests, have been robbed of their machinery and materials. In many of these factories—in the textile industry, for instance—the Germans stole the boilers, the engines, and even the belting. From others they took lathes. From still others they took yard locomotives. Frequently they demolished factories after stripping them, and in some cases actually blew to pieces the very foundations of factories and homes. They demolished more than 50,000 homes completely. They took altogether more than 2,400 locomotives and more than 90,000 cars. They lifted out, in some cases, whole interurban lines, tearing down the trolleys and moving them, tearing up the rails, and taking away the rolling stock, some of which they sent to Russia. Thousands of cattle, horses, and hogs were shipped into Germany, while wide stretches of agricultural lands were desolated. The heaviest losses were the destruction of iron foundries to the extent of $213,000,000, of steel and manufacturing plants exceeding $314,000,000, and of textile factories valued at over $424,000,000. Until these plants are rebuilt, Belgian mechanics will be out of employment and we must wait for the payment of our debt.

FRANCE.

The material losses are appalling. Two thousand five hundred towns and villages and 450,000 buildings completely destroyed, with 50,000 more badly damaged, costing to replace them all over $6,000,000,000. Eight million acres of land were devastated, of which 4,450,000 were farm lands under cultivation. The agricultural and forestry losses are estimated to be $3,000,000,000. In addition to these losses must be added the value of thousands of head of horses and cattle stolen.

Even the clearing away of the wreckage will involve enormous expense. When the Germans retreated from northern France they blew up every railroad bridge and wrecked every station. The lines themselves have either been torn up for replacement in Germany or have been shelled out of existence. The locomotives and cars which escaped capture have been worn out during the war, and there is no new equipment to be had. The losses in transportation are estimated at $1,000,000,000. Seven million spindles and $5,000,000,000 worth of industrial machinery and plants were totally destroyed. Before the war France produced 41,000,000 tons of coal annually, 70 per cent of which came from the invaded regions, now a wilderness. The total estimated damage to French property as the result of war is estimated at over $15,000,000,000.

My interest to-day is with the American farmer and the American manufacturer and with the Nation in collecting her just debts. [Applause.]

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HICKS. Yes; for a question.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask the gentleman, if it is a fair question, What is the origin of this bill; who came before the Congress and asked for the enactment of this legislation?

Mr. HICKS. I can say to the gentleman that I am not a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and will refer him to the chairman.

Mr. PHELAN. I can answer the question. The Federal Reserve Board has recommended legislation of this kind more than once, at least three of four times to my knowledge.

Mr. JUUL. Who brought the skeleton or the frame of it into the House?

Mr. PHELAN. Senator EDGE, of New Jersey, introduced the bill in the Senate and Representative ACKERMAN, of New Jersey, introduced the bill in the House, but it originated, so far as I know, with the Federal Reserve Board. They recommended it at two or three different times. Once we had it before us during the last Congress, and the only reason we did not act on it was that they presented a mere skeleton and we were so busy with other things we did not take it up.

Mr. JUUL. That class of men came before the Congress of the United States and asked for the passage of this bill and——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JUUL, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. STEVENSON rose.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, we do not want a general discussion of the bill on this amendment.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman give me three minutes? I want to clear up this matter as to the origin of this bill.

Mr. JUUL. If it is necessary to get time, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that that is not in order at this time. There is an amendment and an amendment to the amendment pending, and the gentleman can not amend it further without it being an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. JUUL. I hope a proper amendment will be presented for the purpose of getting information.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes as to the origin of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KING. The first proponents were members of the Federal Reserve Board. There has never been a mechanic or a farmer or a business man that has ever appeared before the committee; in fact, nobody except members connected with the Federal Reserve Board. Where did they get it? The Senator's name has been mentioned on the floor here. Where did he get it? New York; from Harris, the banker. Where did he get it? From the Foreign Trade Council. Where did they get it? From the city of London, England; and it was prepared in Europe for the purpose of selling their securities, which is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Why did the gentleman not give that information to the committee?

Mr. KING. I did. You know I was opposed to this in the committee. Does the gentleman want to go into what happened in the committee?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I would be delighted to do so, because the only opportunity you took was to vote "No" when we were through.

Mr. KING. I will not violate the rules of this House by answering the gentleman, but he is in error.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say in regard to the statement that I was chairman of the subcommitee that had under consideration this bill. I personally sent invitations to all classes of people who might be interested in it. They were given every opportunity to be heard and a number of them were heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR] to the committee amendment.

Mr. CANNON. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DUNBAR: Page 5, line 20, after the word "exceeding," strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "six."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I think I would like to say a word in opposition to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate is closed on this proposition. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JUUL. I ask for a division.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to see about this amendment. Have we passed the amendments above that?

The CHAIRMAN. All amendments down to this committee amendment have been adopted.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman permit a question? That was the amendment in line 16?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is that a division has been demanded on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR].

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 28.

Mr. DUNBAR. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman demands tellers. Those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Eleven gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The Chair announced that there were not a sufficient number in favor of tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Not a sufficient number.

Mr. DUNBAR. What percentage is necessary?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty are necessary in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MORGAN: Page 5, line 17, after the word "limitations," insert a comma and the following: "at such rate or rates of interest, payable at such time, based upon such securities and under such safeguards."

Mr. CANNON. Where is that amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. Line 17, on page 5.

Mr. CANNON. Well, all of these amendments——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. I ask a parliamentary question. There are several amendments prior to that. Would that exclude amendments prior to that, from line 4 to line 17?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that those committee amendments have been agreed to by the committee, down to and including line 16.

Mr. CANNON. I did not so understand, and I intended to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman would not be prevented from offering an amendment to the text of the bill, but the committee amendments have been adopted. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is now recognized on the amendment just reported.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, if my amendment were adopted, in line 16, beginning with the word "to," it would read this way:

To issue debentures, bonds, and promissory notes under such limitations, at such rate or rates of interest, payable at such time, based upon such securities and under such safeguards as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe.

I have tried to insert here these various phrases so as to extend by specific direction the power of the Federal Reserve Board to limit the issue of these bonds and debentures.

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman yield for just one second? If he will look at the top of page 5 he will see that every one of these powers is limited——

Mr. MORGAN. I noticed that.

Mr. PHELAN (continuing). To such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, which covers the exact case the gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; but we are going to permit these corporations—and they may grow to very large corporations—to issue debentures and bonds. Now, those are sold to the general public.

We ought not to permit the issue of those bonds and debentures in an unlimited way unless they are based upon some specific and definite security. That is in the interest of the corporation and in the interest of good business as well as to the interest of the public, and inasmuch as the committee claims that the general power put in lines 1, 2, and 3, and the other power down here, is really in the control of the Federal Reserve Board, it seems to me the committee ought not to object to my amendment. In other words, if the Federal Reserve Board does have this power, then an addition to these words does not take from or add to it. If the Federal Reserve Board, under the amendment proposed by the committee, does not have the power to fix the security, to fix the time that these bonds and debentures are to run, and to throw around them the proper safeguards, then we ought to put it in here specifically and definitely.

I do not pretend to know very much about these matters, but I have given some study to these propositions, and the insertion of these words could not hinder the corporation from doing any legitimate business. Indeed, my friends, if under the law these bonds and debentures are issued under these safeguards it would be a help and an assistance to the corporation, because they will want to sell these bonds and debentures at the lowest rate of interest possible and on the best terms possible, and at the least expense and in the largest quantity, and the more they are safeguarded the better it would be for the corporation and for the investing public. And in addition to that the public is entitled to be protected, and there ought not to be an issue of bonds and debentures extending for 4 or 5 or 10 years, or perhaps longer, unless we draw around them such restrictions as will make them absolutely secure and safe. I hope that the committee will consent to the insertion of these words.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I think that a casual reading of this bill will show the want of necessity for the amendment, which would make a double statement of the same thing. At the top of page 5 it says, "Each corporation so organized shall have power under such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe" to issue debentures, promissory notes, and so forth.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
